SEVENTY-SECOND CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

FRIDAY, JULY 8, 1932

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian.

Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., minister of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, still our faltering hearts as we bring our weakness to Thy might, our failure to Thy perfection, our littleness to Thy greatness. May the rush and roar of the tumultuous present not so browbeat our lives that we shall lose our perspective, our poise, and our peace. In demanding days may we possess our souls in patience. May the white principles by which we live, which are the very breath of our better selves, never be strangled by policy or cunning. Search our hearts, and purge them, too, so that nothing unworthy may make us recreant to the dream which has lured the prophets and seers of the ages, when the crooked things shall be made straight, when the wilderness shall blossom as the rose and earth's solitary places shall be made glad. Even in times like these may our faith be triumphant o'er our fears as, in spite of rock and tempest's roar, in spite of false lights on the shore, a nation of freemen from sea to shining sea cry out with patriotism pure and undefiled, "Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears, are all with thee, are all with thee." In the name of our fathers' God, author of liberty, we ask it. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the calendar days of Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, July 5, 6, and 7, 1932, when, on the request of Mr. FESS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Reed
Austin	Dale	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Dickinson	Kean	Schall
Bingham	Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Black	Fess	Keyes	Shipstead
Blaine	Fletcher	King	Shortridge
Borah	Frazier	La Follette	Smoot
Bratton	George	Lewis	Steiwer
Brookhart	Glass	Long	Stephens
Broussard	Glenn	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Bulkley	Goldsborough	McKellar	Townsend
Bulow	Gore	McNary	Trammell

Cohen	Hatfield	Norbeck	Walcott
Connally	Hawes	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Hayden	Nye	Watson
Copeland	Hebert	Patterson	White
Costigan	Howell	Pittman

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

REPORT OF THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION (S. DOC. NO. 135)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, submitted pursuant to law, covering its operations for the period from the organization of the corporation from February 2, 1932, to June 30, 1932, inclusive, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Loren D. Schoppe, secretary of the Franklin Chamber of Commerce, Franklin, Pa., submitting a statement entitled "The Evils of Margin Trading—a Crusade by the Franklin Chamber of Commerce," which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from Erik L. Madisen, editor of the Appleton Review, Appleton, Wis., inclosing an editorial from the Appleton Review of the 1st instant entitled "Prosperity in 24 Hours," submitting a plan for restoring business conditions by the use of liberal bank credits, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a memorial from the rector and members of St. Nicholas Orthodox Russian Church, of Seattle, Wash., remonstrating against recognition of the Soviet Government of Russia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from B. C. S. Herm, Chicago, Ill., relative to prohibition and the regulation of the liquor traffic, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the council of the city of St. Paul, Minn., favoring the passage of the so-called Garner-Wagner emergency relief bill as an aid in the unemployment situation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from the Goodland Building and Loan Association, by Doris E. Soden, president, Goodland, Kans., favoring the passage of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, without the so-called Bingham beer amendment, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from the Wyandotte County League of Building and Loan Associations, by Frank S. Powell, president, Kansas City, Kans., favoring reconsideration by the Senate of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, "on the basis as passed by the House," etc., which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate memorials and letters and telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens and organizations of the States of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Illinois, New York, Minnesota, and Washington remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Dies bill, being the bill (H. R. 12044) to provide for the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists, which were ordered to lie on the table.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, some time ago I presented several thousand names on a petition under the auspices of the Wage Earners' National Relief Association. At that time the body of the petition was printed in full in the RECORD. I do not ask that that be done now. I simply refer to that and ask that the petition which I now present, signed by 19,207 names in favor of unemployment relief, be received, that there be printed in the RECORD the itemized list of the cities and number of signatures from each, and that the petition lie on the table.

There being no objection, the petition was received, ordered to lie on the table, and the list to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Itemized list of cities and the number of signatures from each

Chicago, Ill	1,167
Cleveland, Ohio	1,007
Cincinnati, Ohio	10,618
Louisville, Ky	100
Ashtabula, Ohio	400
Conneaut, Ohio	250
Columbus, Ohio	400
Baltimore, Md	415
Dayton, Ohio	600
Detroit, Mich	4,250
Total	19,207

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 855) for the relief of William Ray Taplin, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 989) thereon.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 461) making appropriations to enable the Federal Farm Board to distribute Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 990) thereon.

Mr. BROOKHART, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3770) to prevent the obstruction of and burdens upon interstate trade and commerce in copyrighted motion-picture films, and to prevent restraint upon free competition in the production, distribution, and exhibition of copyrighted motion-picture films (a) by prohibiting the compulsory block-booking of copyrighted motion-picture films; (b) by making unlawful unreasonable and discriminatory protection in favor of certain theaters over others; (c) to compel the furnishing of accurate synopses of all pictures offered to theater operators before the same have been released and reviewed; and (d) to amend section 2 of the Clayton Act to make it apply to license agreements and leases as well as sales in interstate commerce, reported it without amendment.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 4961) granting a pension to Elsie Blanchard (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FESS:

A bill (S. 4962) to provide for the sale of internal-revenue stamps by postmasters in cities of over 2,500 inhabitants; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HASTINGS:

A bill (S. 4963) to amend the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SHORTRIDGE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 194) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to render findings of facts in the claim of the Mack Copper Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10246) to fix the fees to be charged for the issue of domestic money orders.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10494) to provide a postage charge on notices to publishers regarding undeliverable second-class matter.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On July 6, 1932:

S. 2570. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of Joseph E. Bourrie Co.;

S. 3447. An act for the relief of John Stratis;

S. 4759. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Florence, Nebr.; and

S. 4874. An act to grant a right of way or easement over lands of the United States within the Upper Mississippi River Wild Life and Fish Refuge to the Savanna-Sabula Bridge Co., a corporation, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a highway between Savanna, Ill., and Sabula, Iowa.

On July 7, 1932:

S. 904. An act for the relief of Elizabeth B. Dayton; and

S. 4735. An act to authorize the acceptance of relinquishments by the State of Arizona and the city of Tempe, Ariz., to certain tracts of lands granted by the act of April 7, 1930, and to direct the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to said tracts to the Salt River Valley Water Users Association.

REPORT OF THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In compliance with paragraph 5, section 2, of the Army appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, I transmit herewith the Sixteenth Annual Report of the Council of National Defense for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1932.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 8, 1932.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, submitting sundry nominations in the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PURCHASE OF POST-OFFICE SITE IN NEW YORK CITY

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The attention of the senior Senator from New York is requested.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

Mr. BLAINE. A few days ago when the Philippine independence bill was before the Senate as the unfinished business the Senator from New York had the floor. During the afternoon I was called from the Chamber. The Senator from New York asked for the consideration of a bill which was then on the calendar providing for the purchase of the Grand Central Office Station for post-office purposes and made the statement that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] had objected to the consideration of the bill previously, but failed to make the statement that I had seriously and vigorously objected to the consideration and passage of the bill. The bill, however, was taken up and passed, immediately forwarded to the House, an amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania there agreed to, and the bill then immediately messaged to the President.

I now have a letter from Mr. Stewart Browne, president of the United Real Estate Owners' Association, protesting against the bill and showing quite clearly, in his letter to the President dated July 7, that the amount provided for in the bill is an excessive price. I desire to offer for the RECORD the letter from Mr. Browne. It is a letter addressed to the President of the United States asking him to disapprove of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED REAL ESTATE OWNERS' ASSOCIATION,
New York City, July 7, 1932.

The PRESIDENT,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: We understand that a bill has passed Congress and waits your signature to purchase the property, now rented by it, for its Grand Central Office Station and pay about $15,000,000 for the property.

For the following reasons we protest against such an outrageous purchase:

Assessed valuation of the property

Year	Land	Building	Total
1920	$1,350,000	$2,050,000	$3,400,000
1927	4,625,000	1,875,000	6,500,000
1930	5,250,000	1,900,000	7,250,000
1932	6,025,000	1,475,000	7,500,000

This building is 30 years old. Its present value is its present reconstruction cost of $1,800,000, less 2 per cent depreciation per annum for 30 years, or $700,000, making its value $1,100,000.

There is no such increase in land value as shown above. Between 1930 and 1932 all land values in Manhattan had decreased fully 25 per cent instead of increasing.

No property in Manhattan has sold in 1930, 1931, and 1932 for anything like its assessed valuation, generally for 75 per cent or less.

The New York Central has an easement under the building for its tracks. That easement represents at least 20 per cent of the property's fee value.

The Graybar Building interests are said to have an unexpired option on this property.

The post office rents (under a lease expiring December 31, 1933) the whole of the property it proposes buying. What rent it pays we have no means of knowing.

We have had political graft in all property bought by the city of New York, but no political graft ever equaled this.

Why should the Federal Government buy when it can continue to rent, and why should it buy now?

If the Post Office Department insists upon buying this property, why doesn't the Government buy it by condemnation proceedings?

We respectfully ask that you veto this bill.

I am, sir, respectfully yours,

STEWART BROWNE, President.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in response to what the Senator from Wisconsin said, in view of the fact that he asked my attention be given to his remarks, it is true that the bill was called up in the Senate. I anticipated that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] would make an objection, but his objection was satisfied by reason of the adoption of an amendment which he himself offered. But I said privately to the Senator from Wisconsin that which I repeat here, that as I understand the matter the Senator from Wisconsin objected because the bill had not been referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Am I right in that?

Mr. BLAINE. My objection, when I stated it upon the floor, was that the price fixed in the bill was excessive, that the Interstate Commerce Commission through its valuation division could very readily value the land, and I assert now that had I been present when the bill was called up for consideration, I would have offered an amendment providing that the purchase should be made at a price not exceeding the value fixed by the valuation division of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have been assured that the Interstate Commerce Commission will be asked to make an appraisal. Furthermore, I agree fully with the Senator that if the amount carried in the bill were to be the price paid, I should think it excessive, but the bill provides that not to exceed the amount named therein shall be the sum fixed. There will be negotiations between the Treasury and the Post Office Departments, on the one hand, and the owners of the property, on the other, and the advice of the Interstate Commerce Commission obtained, so that when the price is finally fixed, I have no doubt it will be materially less than the upset price provided for in the bill.

WEALTH AND RESOURCES OF AMERICA

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Count Your Change," appearing in Collier's magazine of July 9, 1932.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COUNT YOUR CHANGE

There's no argument in this editorial. It's merely a collection of facts, incontrovertible, eloquent facts that confound those who profess to see America slipping down into a state of effortless despair.

America's mutual savings-bank deposits are $1,233,000,000 higher than they were at the peak of the boom three years ago.

Total bank savings to-day exceed $29,000,000,000, equal to more than $1,000 for every family in the land.

Savings depositors number 52,000,000, nearly 2 per family.

The number of Americans owning stock has increased almost 40 per cent since 1929.

A group of 102 companies which had 5,539,036 stockholders at the end of the boom year had 7,675,143 stockholders at the beginning of this year.

One company alone to-day has over 665,000 stockholders, a gain of more than 195,000 since the boom. This company (American Telephone & Telegraph) has assets exceeding $3,200,000,000.

No other nation on the face of the earth can show such widespread ownership of money and stocks.

Our total stock of gold is $4,000,000,000. No other country ever possessed so much. Britain, for example, has only $588,000,000.

Currency in circulation aggregates $5,464,000,000 or $700,000,000 more than in the boom.

A recent offering of $450,000,000 of United States Treasury securities elicited subscriptions totaling $4,196,296,700—more than nine times the amount offered.

Last year $16,500,000,000 worth of new life insurance was written.

Total insurance now carried is estimated at $109,000,000,000, or not far short of $1,000 for every man, woman, and child in the United States.

Policies in force total 127,800,000.

One company alone (Metropolitan) has in force many more policies (44,520,810) than there are families in America.

Such safeguard, such security, is enjoyed by the people of no other nation in the world.

Our total national wealth, estimated at $329,700,000,000, is greater than that of a dozen continental European countries combined.

The income of the American people comfortably exceeds $1,000,000,000 a week.

The per capita income here is far greater than in any other land.

There are still six or seven persons gainfully employed for every person idle.

Foreigners owe American investors approximately $18,000,000,000. In addition, foreign governments owe our Government $7,000,000,000, and we are still selling abroad more than we are buying.

No fewer than 25,800,000 automobiles are owned by Americans—almost one for every family.

This total is almost three times the number owned by all the rest of the world.

Americans possess far more telephones (19,500,000) than all other countries put together.

Radios continue to multiply. The latest authoritative computation puts the total at over 16,545,000, representing an investment of more than $1,600,000,000, also a record unapproached by any other people.

How many new domestic mechanical refrigerators have been bought, would you guess? A grand total of fully 3,750,000, at an estimated expenditure approaching $2,000,000,000. And most of these have been installed in the last three years. In no other part of the globe do half as many homes enjoy such a luxury; Americans are rapidly coming to regard it as a necessity.

America has more home owners than any other nation.

A recent survey of 29 typical small towns revealed that 71 per cent of the inhabitants owned their homes, that 88 per cent had electric light, 72 per cent had baths, 51 per cent had electric washers, 55 per cent had radios, 41 per cent had vacuum cleaners.

There are more families in America than in any other land that can afford to and do send their children to high school and college.

In no other land do so many average families have the means to enjoy foreign travel.

Expansion in airplane travel, the most costly of all common forms of overland transportation, has been greater here than abroad during recent times.

The theater of the masses, the movie, still attracts a weekly average attendance of 75,000,000.

Our so-called national "luxury" bill is still away up in the billions a year.

It took a billion and a quarter pounds of candy to satisfy our sweet tooth in 1931—no decrease from the 1929 total.

The percentage of our agricultural population who, despite deflation, are acquiring domestic comforts, conveniences, labor-saving devices, improved machinery, the use of better roads, is constantly increasing.

To-day more than 700,000 farms are electrified, representing an increase of 400 per cent in eight years, and the total is being swelled rapidly.

In industrial communities hard manual toil is being steadily abolished by the introduction of machinery. Each American worker now has at his command five horsepower, a record not even remotely approached outside our boundaries.

The average working day a generation ago was 10 to 12 hours. The standard in this generation is eight hours, with the trend running toward a still shorter workday.

The work week used to consist of six (even seven) days. Now it is 5½ days, with the 5-day week coming into vogue.

America has always recovered from periods of depression and pressed forward to new heights of prosperity.

Never in the past was America so well equipped as it is to-day to resume an epochal forward march. Not only have we changed from a debtor Nation to the greatest creditor Nation on earth, not only have we vaster national wealth, not only have we an unprecedented supply of gold, but we are richer in experience, richer in inventive brains, richer in scientific knowledge, richer in machinery, richer in productive facilities, richer in managerial skill, richer in discovered mineral and oil resources, richer in transportation facilities by land and air and water, richer in every material wealth-creating product and process, richer in craftsmanship, richer in everything * * *.

Clip this page out of Collier's and put it in your pocket. It will bear rereading many times this summer when politicians invite you to tear your hair over the state of the country. The country is all right. What we need is less hysteria and more confidence and courage.

INCOME FROM COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND SURVEYS DISCLOSURES

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 264), as follows:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation be, and it hereby is, requested to secure from the Secretary of the Treasury and submit to the two Houses of Congress at the earliest practicable time full and complete information concerning any and all taxes and penalties which have been collected by or paid into the Treasury consequent upon disclosures made before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the Senate in the course of the investigation conducted by it pursuant to Senate Resolution 101, Seventieth Congress, first session, or through inquiries prosecuted incidental to such investigation, including the date of payments, the amount of the same, and the persons making the payments; and likewise, in so far as it may not be incompatible with the public interest, further information concerning any claims or demands being made by the Treasury against any persons or corporations for taxes or penalties over and above such sums as may have been heretofore paid on account of the receipt of assets so disclosed and not duly reported for taxation as required by law.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, since the resolution asks only for information, I am sure it will not occasion debate or argument at this time, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to hear the resolution again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will again be read.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am somewhat confused by the language of the resolution, and I should like to have a statement made by the Senator from North Dakota as to what it proposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator making a statement? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the language employed in this resolution is not unlike the language used in the resolution of May 3, 1928, offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. This resolution is offered at the present time merely to secure the information that is available, since the Internal Revenue Bureau complied with the request of 1928, and I am sure there can be no objection to its adoption.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I want to read the resolution carefully, and, temporarily at least, I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over for the day.

CHANGES IN ENROLLMENT OF LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION ACT OF 1933

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 33) submitted by Mr. BINGHAM on June 28, 1932, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed, in the enrollment of H. R. 11267 (the legislative appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933) to strike out all of section 213 (including the caption thereof) and to make such changes in section numbers and cross-references thereto as are made necessary by striking out such section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that the resolution should be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the concurrent resolution, if adopted, could have no possible effect at the present time, I ask that it may be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MEMORIAL DAY SERVICES—ADDRESS BY COMMANDER BAINBRIDGE

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered on the Sunday before Memorial Day by Commander William Seaman Bainbridge, United States Naval Reserve, under the auspices of the American Legion of New York County, at St. Thomas Church, New York City.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Comrades and friends, just why a spiritual leader like my friend, Dr. Brooks, rector of St. Thomas, or some other outstanding inspirational orator is not here to address you to-day in my stead, is beyond my ken. And yet, as I have thought it over since receiving the invitation from the American Legion committee, it does appear that when we consider war and all that war means, a doctor with military experience can speak from personal knowledge that others do not possess. From the battlefields and on through the years, it is the physician who comes into closest touch with suffering, disease, and death, and that may be the excuse for my presence on this occasion.

To-day is a day of remembrance, when we again think of the call we all had to service, and of those who were chosen for the supreme sacrifice. They accepted and bravely gave their all. Not only what they were but, a vast deal more, they gave what they might have been. Although we were called we were not chosen for that great sacrifice. Ours has been a different duty—that of carrying on, as important and oft as hard as going west in battle casualty. Our comrades who have gone are not fallen, but risen! And I affirm that no one can gainsay that they may not be watching to-day how we fulfill the charge to keep the faith with our country and with them, as we march along through the years.

But there are many others for whom this day should be one of remembrance. There are those who have the arduous duty which sorely strains, to continue to live, handicapped in body, or nerve, or mind. Theirs is a continuing sacrifice, which challenges our thought, our sympathy, and our untiring aid.

In this connection I am reminded of an American officer in the World War, married, with two dependent children. He was beyond the draft age, but he had something his country needed—expert knowledge in a certain department of engineering. He was asked to go and he went, with the full consent and cooperation of the mother of his little brood—this her contribution. Splendid service was performed by this officer, but he was stricken with tuberculosis following an attack of influenza and pleurisy at the front. He was brought home and lived in a little hut in the Carolina mountains. His lung was riddled and he was racked with pain. Week after week for three years he fought his hardest fight. The glamour of the battlefield, the plaudits of those enthusiastic over the bravery and patriotism of the soldier boy had long since died away. He was fighting his battle largely alone. At the end of the third year he passed on, and under his pillow was found a little leather case, covered with isinglass, into which he had slipped a motto, and above which he had written: "I received this from a poilu at the front. He used it as his motto and tried to live it. I have been trying to live it, too. Others must decide whether I have succeeded." The verse was:

> "I know the thought shall comfort me
> When death summons me down the arches of the years,
> I gave my laughter with my every breath;
> I hid my tears."

We must think, too, of thousands and thousands of little homes—childless, and of the multitude of young women, now in middle life, going through their earthly journey without the realization of that supreme ideal of partnership and the consummation of dreams for the future. The strength of our land, the hope of the days to come, lie in the homes with little children growing up with firm belief in God and love of country. In proportion as war has eliminated these, in that degree has our land been weakened and impoverished. There remains for a multitude of noble women only a heart-sickening knowledge that their air castles have fallen and that they must go on never to hear themselves called "Mother."

In this day of economic stress and strain we must think, also, of the fathers and mothers who, early in their lives, made their great investment in the education of their boys, forfeiting thereby a bank account and material treasures for the long day at the end of the road. They equipped their sons and looked forward to the time when the shadows would lengthen and the sunset glow be nearer, and, through their boys, they would have a happy, quiet eventide, without the suffering caused by want. They gave a priceless contribution to their country and their country's cause. Many forfeited ease and comfort in their older years. These heroic fathers and mothers should receive the honor due them as their strength lessens, their days shorten, and they plod along.

When we evaluate heroism and bravery on the battlefield, let us remember the continuing heroism and bravery of these groups of people, for war interrelates all of them.

Perforce government can not have a heart. It must be largely head work. It is a business, mechanical and metallic. Yet, how wonderfully the heart is interjected during war. A common danger makes us all one. No longer does war mean armies and navies alone, it means whole peoples; and at these times there is an outflowing of real sentiment, and Himalayan peaks of love and helpfulness for one's countrymen are reached. After war, there is a quick transition back into the mechanical business measures of government. But we must remember that there is still unfinished heart work and it is for the churches of the Prince of Peace, and the patriotic societies such as the American Legion, and other agencies, to complete this complementary work of the heart and hand for the head work of government.

We were all willing to do all we could in the war, and the only request we made was to be placed where we could do most, and we tried to do all we could, the best we could, wherever we were. Providentially, we were saved to form the home guard, so to speak, to march on with changing conditions and dangers. One of the greatest burdens we have to carry is the calumnous slander that we are lovers of war and militaristic in our efforts. That is a grievous wrong. Those of us who know most of war abhor it most. None of us want it again. We hope and pray for the day of a real brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God. But, worse than war is to capitulate to those sinister forces that seek to destroy the home, religion, and all that we hold worth while to-day. Any country that is unable to defend itself from enemies from without or from within that would destroy it, as well as the birthright passed down by its forefathers who created it, is already dying. We have a glorious heritage, and we are determined to preserve for all who come after that which we have had handed down to us.

The Bible tells us to seek peace and pursue it. Overt acts both—no pusillanimous inertia. After finding peace, we must keep after it, or it will be illusory and fly away.

We are also told to "be strong and of good courage." The first part of these six words asks for adequate preparedness and the second part for the right kind of spirit.

There is a war experience which comes to mind as I address you to-day. It seems to me relevant to present conditions as we face them and glance into the future. It was near "Flanders fields, where poppies grow between the crosses row on row," at the Lafayette Escadrille, before we entered actively into the conflict. An American officer, Major Thaw, was in charge. I was there for a short time when on a tour of inspection on both sides of the firing line for our Government. Morning after morning when issuing the day's orders Thaw would say, "Tom, you go up at such and such a time, and if you do not come back, Bill will go," and then Ed, and so on and on. "If you do not come back" did not have to be explained to any of them.

Thaw was very fond of his men, all American boys, and they of him. I studied the man and could not find any human emotion in him. He took without an apparent quiver the pronouncement of the death, perhaps of one of his most loved comrades. I determined to see if he was not something more than an automaton, and so went to his dugout. It was bare of everything but books or pamphlets of hard facts on air combat.

But under his bed I found his shaving kit, and in it a broken piece of glass that had been saved after the explosion of a shell. On the back of this glass was pasted a verse of a poem. I took it to one of his men, Dudley Hill, and said, "Dudley, what about this?" With a deep mellowness in his voice that spoke volumes, he answered: "Oh, the 'old man' has a mushy streak in him. He often repeats that to us or to himself when we take off."

That message which Thaw gave to his men facing death is a message for each of us to-day in this world of ours, in this country of ours, which seems so upside down. Perhaps man's extremity may be God's opportunity, and this message may be a call from the Captain of all:

> Quit you like men; be strong!
> There's a work to do,
> There's a world to make new,
> There's a call for men who are brave and true.
> Oh! On with a song.

REPEAL OF EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the motion entered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 114, which will be read by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114) proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to intoxicating liquors.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, on Tuesday last I entered a motion to discharge the Judiciary Committee from further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 114, to repeal the eighteenth amendment, which I introduced in the Senate on March 2, 1932. The platforms of the two great parties clearly demonstrate that the Nation is demanding of Congress immediate and definite action with respect to the question of prohibition.

I asked on Tuesday unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of my motion; but, though the ink was hardly dry on the prohibition resolution written by the Democratic Party at Chicago, a member of that party on the other side of the aisle in this body felt constrained to object to my request. The motion has laid over, however, for the required period under the rules, and therefore I wish to renew it at this time.

It is most difficult for me to understand the hesitancy of the Senate to act on this matter. Certainly there can be no doubt as to the will of the people.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator that, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, I referred the joint resolution, as I did a good many others of similar import, to a subcommittee. The subcommittee has not as yet reported to the full committee, but, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to discharging the Judiciary Committee from the further consideration of the joint resolution and to its passage if that will save time.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I appreciate the statement and attitude of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I may suggest to the Senator that a debate on the joint resolution might lead to some contention, and if he wants to have it passed we ought to vote on it.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey desire to retain the floor?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; Mr. President, I desire to retain the floor.

There is no doubt as to the failure of prohibition. There is no doubt that the economic welfare of the Nation would be served by its repeal. As I stated Tuesday, the Senate of the United States at this session of Congress has acted upon every major issue of the day, however controversial, that has come before it. It is a splendid record and one of which I am proud. I can not believe that the Senate will adjourn without taking action on the question of prohibition, for every Member must concede, whatever his own individual ideas may be, that this subject is as much on the minds of the people, if not more so, than any other issue.

One of the difficulties of our national life to-day, as I see it, is the multiplicity of the problems facing us. It is difficult to rivet public attention to any one problem for any great length of time. Newspapers to-day, for example, focus our attention upon the distressing, heart-rending plight of the bonus marchers. To-morrow we may be horrified by the snatching from the cradle of a child of a family who for years have devoted their lives and energies to the glory of the American Nation. The headlines take us from the pressing need for disarmament one day to the hardships entailed the next day by the collapse of a bank. If these problems were to arise one by one at such intervals as to permit of our concerted and undivided attention, I am very sure that we would have the courage and wisdom to solve them promptly and effectively. Unfortunately, however, we are, I fear, torn and besieged on all sides by the perplexing and relentless attack of a host of issues demanding solution. I think everyone will agree with me, however, that it has not been difficult to direct steady and growing attention to the evils of prohibition. Ever since its adoption, step by step, it has been its own creator of increasing dissatisfaction. On its doorsteps have been laid a multitude of ills, including corruption, crime, racketeering, kidnaping, bribery, and economic distress. This is the one outstanding issue to which the American people have given most thought and upon which they have finally and unquestionably made up their minds. There is, undoubtedly, a constantly growing unanimity of demand for repeal.

It is a certainty, I feel, that even the most bitter opponents of prohibition a decade ago could not have conceived of the proven evils that have followed in its wake. It was claimed by prohibition's sponsors that our jails would be emptied; that a new and loftier moral character would take form; that the money the workingman spent in the saloon would be diverted to the home, for the education of his children, and better things in life for himself and his family.

Instead, we are presented to-day with the alarming spectacle in numerous instances of corrupted local, county, and State governments, wherein the shameless hand of graft has found its way. We find our jails, rather than being emptied, actually overcrowded with a new and more sinister type of occupant to whom human life is so cheap that even members of juries have feared to convict the obviously guilty. We have found courts corrupted, charlatans masked as public servants in back-alley conferences with the underworld. We have found the speakeasy supplant the saloon and go it one better, both in respect to its prevalence and its influence for evil.

Never in the history of the United States—never, I believe I can truthfully say, in the history of the world—has a nation so highly developed as ours been so helpless in the grip of the criminal element or so immersed in official corruption as our own. And a zealous minority, availing itself of every stratagem to prevent the free expression of the voice of a majority of the people, argues that all this is not attributable to prohibition—that somewhere else lies the cause.

Heretofore, waves of crime then, as now, were attributed to a natural reaction from the horrors and carnage of war. But in this instance crime has continued on the increase for too long a time in this country to validate that explanation. The cause is deeper rooted, more widespread even, closer to home, and from a moral standpoint even more devastating than war.

For 12 years the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act have been apparently regarded by successive Congresses as things apart from the ordinary run of legislation. They have been regarded as almost sacred, in the sense that any proposals for change have been looked upon with immediate displeasure and resentment.

Congress, apparently, has not dared to bring the issue to a vote. Certainly it has not permitted its own Members thus far to vote on the subject of repeal; and, which in my opinion is even worse, it has consistently opposed heretofore the submission of the question to the people of the Nation, so that they might have an opportunity of expressing themselves on the question.

This Congress seems to be endeavoring to follow that precedent, although it is apparent that a greater courage is being shown by many of our statesmen now than was the case but a very short time ago. The vote on the Beck-Linthicum bill demonstrates this new trend; and it is now becoming more and more apparent that sooner or later some Congress must consent to release the grip which a minority group of our population has on the Federal Government in respect to this subject.

It seems very apparent to me, as it most certainly must seem to every other thinking man and woman in the Nation to-day, that such control by a minority is inconsistent with the premise of government laid down by Abraham Lincoln—government by the people.

A national crisis undoubtedly created prohibition, but the present crisis will certainly end it; and while I have no illusions myself as to the great numbers of men estimated by some who would obtain employment directly as a result of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, repeal would without doubt result in stimulating employment to a considerable degree, and repeal perhaps more than anything else would help us to restore confidence in a large measure, and would certainly give to us a welcome and much-needed source of revenue.

Mr. C. T. Revere, a resident of Westfield, N. J., has prepared several very forceful articles and addresses on the economic aspects of prohibition. In a radio address on May 11, Mr. Revere called attention to the fact that during the 12 years in which prohibition has been in force our Government has foregone a total of $11,000,000,000 of revenue that it could have obtained had it not been for the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. This estimate, which Mr. Revere states has been verified as carefully as is humanly possible, is based on the per capita consumption of the States which permitted the sale of alcoholic beverages at the time prohibition took effect. Consumption is figured at the rate that prevailed from 1910 to 1914. The excise rates employed to calculate the revenue were those in force in 1919, which included a maximum tax of $6 per barrel on beer and $8.50 per gallon on spirits.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. For what purpose?

Mr. BROOKHART. I wish to ask the Senator about this tax which he says the Government has failed to collect.

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. What is the largest amount per year that the Government ever collected from the liquor traffic before prohibition?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am sorry that I can not answer the Senator's question offhand.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator had looked that up he would not make that statement about $11,000,000,000.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am not surprised that the Senator takes that position.

Moreover, in my opinion, the case against the economic error of prohibition which Mr. Revere points out is not fully stated when we merely say that our National Government would not be facing a financial crisis if it were not for the eighteenth amendment, for conditions will improve when and only when we remove the obstacle of prohibition from our national life, regardless of anything else we may do to try to cure the depression in the meantime.

We could take this fast-accruing revenue and dedicate it to the cause of rehabilitation. We could employ half of it for balancing a national Budget that has been scaled down by economies already effected. We might, if Congress deemed wise, allocate the other billion and a quarter to the States to ease the tax burden on agriculture, and thus pave the way for lifting more than $9,000,000,000 of mortgages on farm properties. We could reduce our taxes on industry and real property, and by so doing we would restore bond values to a more normal investment basis, and facilitate the return to solvency of many of our closed banks. The timid would begin to buy. Millions would be put to work to supply withheld requirements. Increased pay rolls would provide new buying power. The demand for raw materials of every kind would lift the burden of poverty from millions of persons throughout the land.

In the face of these facts, I, for one, am convinced that prohibition is not worth the $11,000,000,000 it is estimated to have cost in the last 12 years. It is certainly not worth the price of continuing the depression.

The resolution which I introduced months ago, before any planks were thought of in either convention, permits States which wish to remain dry to do so, but at the same time permits States desiring a change to enact such laws of their own as would reflect the wishes of their electorate. No State should be forced by any other State to submit to legislation of this particular character objectionable to the electorate of that State; and, by the same token, no State can have any valid objection to the ratification of this amendment unless that State actually wishes to reserve the right to force its own views upon those who do not agree with it. Had my amendment originally been enacted instead of the eighteenth amendment as passed, no such controversy as now confronts the Nation would exist.

Certainly with the very pillars of our Government resting upon the premises of majority rule and free expression, the time has arrived when the demands of the majority must be hearkened to, and the sovereign rights of the States become more than a mere phrase.

To conclude, it has been said that prohibition does not prohibit. But it does prohibit. It prohibits temperance, respect for the law, and a reduction in taxation.

I move, therefore, to discharge the Judiciary Committee from further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 114, and upon that motion I request the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. REED. I have looked at the Senator's resolution, and, as I interpret it, it would require the assent of the legislatures of three-quarters of the States. Would the Senator, after his resolution comes to the floor, expect to resist an amendment that would provide for submission to conventions called in the separate States?

Mr. BARBOUR. Not necessarily.

Mr. REED. What is the Senator's view about that? Does not the Senator think that the convention system would be the better way of getting the direct thought of the people of the separate States?

Mr. BARBOUR. I agree with the Senator absolutely on that. I prefer that any submission, if made, be made to conventions and not to legislatures.

Mr. REED. Then I have another question about the matter. Some of us feel that while the present condition is intolerable, it would be equally intolerable to repeal all of these regulatory laws and go back to saloon days. What would be the Senator's position with regard to an amendment to his proposed constitutional amendment intended to prohibit any State from authorizing the consumption of liquor at the place where it was sold?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will answer the Senator by saying that personally I am absolutely against anything that would cause the return of the saloon.

Mr. REED. Is not that the only way to prevent return of the saloon?

Mr. BARBOUR. That is one way, certainly. As far as I am concerned, I should have no wish to see the return of the saloon.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator object to an amendment which would tend to safeguard the rights of those States that preferred to remain dry?

Mr. BARBOUR. No. That is covered, I believe, by my resolution; but, if this point can be better worded, I should have no objection to that.

Mr. REED. Then, Mr. President, I shall be very glad to vote for the Senator's motion.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, that being so, why should the Senator insist upon discharging the Judiciary Committee from further consideration of his resolution? His resolution—to which I am not objecting, I should have it understood—is far from conforming to the platform of his party adopted at Chicago; and as so much stress is just now being laid upon party declarations, I am a little astonished that the Senator from the wettest State in the United States should so far depart from his party platform as not to provide in his resolution against any of the alleged evils that his party platform decries.

I shall not object to discharging the Judiciary Committee; but it seems to me a most inconsistent proposition to discharge the Judiciary Committee from the consideration of a resolution which the Senator himself says he is willing to have amended in various vital particulars.

Mr. BARBOUR. I should like to remind the Senator, if I may, that, as I said, this resolution was introduced in March, before there were any platforms of either party, or any prohibition planks in either platform. Even if that were not so, however, I personally do not favor the Republican platform as finally adopted in Chicago.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, the Senator would be guilty of the impious act of disregarding a party platform?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. REED. Since the Senator from New Jersey is being reproached for his failure to conform to the platform of the Republican Party, perhaps he would be willing to let me ask the Senator from Virginia whether he approves the Democratic plank on prohibition.

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. But I do favor submitting to the people the question of repeal or retention of the eighteenth amendment. I did that and prepared a resolution to that effect for my own State convention before either the Republican convention or the Democratic convention assembled. I think the people have a right now, on this bitterly controverted question, after a trial of nearly 14 years, to determine whether they want to continue this situation or correct it; but I favor that, not because any party platform declared for it, but because it conforms to my own judgment in the matter.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I favor the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. A considerable number——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to state to the Senator that, so far as I know, there is no opposition to the passage of the resolution. If he wants it passed, what is the use of talking about it?

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well, Mr. President.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee last December, in response to a question of mine, said that subcommittees would be promptly appointed to consider amendments to the Constitution repealing the eighteenth amendment, altering the eighteenth amendment, and modifying the Volstead Act. Carrying out his promise, a few days later he appointed and announced the membership of a subcommittee consisting of five Senators. My recollection is that he said at the time that there would be three drys and two wets on this subcommittee. For the two "wets" he selected the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT]. For the three "drys" he selected the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], I believe.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] may have been selected at that time.

A few days later, however, the Senator from Arizona objected to being on this committee, and gave out a statement, from which I shall quote. The statement appeared in the Evening Star on Tuesday, December 29. The reason why I quote this is that the Senator, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, made some remarks yesterday about this very matter. The heading is, "ASHURST quits dry quiz; wasted efforts, he says. Assails attempt to change prohibition laws as ridiculous.

"BLACK gets post."

Then he got off a very neat epigram:

People looking for jobs, not jags, declares Arizona Senator.

Describing attempts to change the prohibition laws as "a ridiculous waste of effort," Senator ASHURST, Democrat, Arizona, to-day withdrew from a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee named to hold hearings on the subject.

In a statement Senator ASHURST said:

"I voted for the eighteenth amendment, for the Volstead law, for the antibeer bill, and for all the appropriations necessary to enforce the same.

"I do not believe I made any mistake in so voting.

"I have no time to waste in aiding those who are attempting to weaken or relax that amendment."

I am glad to see that the Senator has now changed his mind, in accordance with his statement yesterday.

He said:

"I have no time to waste in aiding those who are attempting to relax or weaken that amendment or those laws. It is a ridiculous waste of effort to attempt to relax or modify the prohibition laws. The people are looking for jobs, not jags."

Another friend of prohibition, Senator BLACK, Democrat, Alabama, was appointed to fill Senator ASHURST's place by Chairman NORRIS, of the Judiciary Committee.

I understand that Senator BLACK later withdrew. It seems that the drys were not at that time interested in meeting this situation.

Chairman NORRIS pointed out that the change in personnel did not disturb the wet and dry line-up of the subcommittee.

"I named a wet chairman, and put a majority of drys on the committee," he said.

NORRIS said taking evidence was to "some extent foolish, but neither side will be satisfied without it."

Mr. President, obviously the chairman of the committee, who is so anxious now to let this bill come back before the Senate from his committee, was not particularly anxious to have any one of the various bills sent to his committee reported back. Some of them have been there since December 9, particularly Senate Joint Resolution 31, and others. Now he appears to be willing to have the committee discharged. But the Judiciary Committee has been considering the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and amendments to the Volstead Act ever since December.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, since the Senator was so kind as to refer to me, will he allow me a word?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. In the classic days of ancient Greece the seashores were lined with an edible turtle or tortoise, which had a remarkably thick shell. The eagles used to pounce upon these tortoises or turtles, carry them into the air, and, descrying a stone below, drop the tortoise or the turtle upon the stone and crack the shell, thus releasing for the eagle's sustenance the rich flesh of the turtle.

One of the great Greek tragic poets, Æschylus, came to his death in a strange fashion. An eagle seized a large and a heavy-shelled tortoise, flew into the air with it, and dropped it upon the head of Æschylus, thinking his head was a stone.

The American eagle does not have to drop a heavy weight upon my head, Mr. President, for me to observe the plain intent and purpose of the American people.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I am delighted that the Senator from Arizona has changed the view he entertained when he said that it is a ridiculous waste of effort to attempt to relax or modify the prohibition laws. I am delighted that he is going to help in these efforts which some of us on both sides of the aisle have been endeavoring to make for some time, without annoying the Senate too greatly, but still insisting on, because we knew we were right.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. May I inquire whether the Senator from Arizona has reached that ridiculous posture as that he favors dropping a beer barrel on the hearth of every home in the country?

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator address that question to me?

Mr. GLASS. Yes. I am talking about the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut to insist upon a beer amendment to a home bank bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to answer that?

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. No amount of clamor, no amount of shouting or screeching, no amount of talk, in the Senate or out, will induce me to violate the Constitution.

Let this issue be drawn once and finally. If the Senator from Connecticut can prove, not by his words, for he is not a chemist, but if the Senator can prove to the Senate that 4 per cent beer, by weight or by volume, is not intoxicating and will produce a revenue, I am ready to vote for it now, next week, or next year; but the Senator must first produce proof that what he seeks to have manufactured is not intoxicating.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. May I inquire of the Senator from Arizona whether he knows what the evidence was that was produced before the Democratic National Convention along the beer line that led them to adopt their prohibition plank?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to answer?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield further.

Mr. ASHURST. Many honors, Mr. President, have come to me in my time, and I am only an humble gleaner in the field of the Democratic Party. I do not pretend to be a leader. Great as the honors I have had, I was not honored by being chosen as a delegate to the Democratic National Convention. I have said before that it was a disappointment to me, and now that I have read of that historic convention, and heard it on the radio, I see how much I missed. Therefore I do not know what testimony was taken before the committee. I will have to call upon Senators who are members of the committee and heard the testimony.

Mr. BINGHAM. I assume that the Senator in his attitude toward the percentage of alcohol which might be had in beer calls himself a "gleaner" because the definition in the dictionary of "gleaner" is "one who collects in small quantities."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I knew it was an act of temerity for me to debate with the Senator from Connecticut. Again he is imposing on my inferiority complex, "still harping on my daughter." Every time I have a debate with him I am worried for fear I may split an infinitive or give vent to a pleonasm. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me as a member of the platform committee of the Democratic National Convention to answer the question of the Senator from Illinois propounded to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. GORE. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. There was not one particle of testimony taken before that committee as to what constituted the alcoholic content of an intoxicating beverage, and the Senator from Illinois will search in vain for one suggestion in the Democratic platform in advocacy of the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I suppose that reckless disregard of facts or evidence on that subject was one of the things which led the distinguished Senator from Virginia to refer yesterday to the recent Democratic National Convention as "a frenzied political assembly."

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and the Republican convention in the same terms, and a little worse.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is perhaps too late now, but I rose to inquire whether there was any implication in any of these remarks about Æschylus that anybody else was a blockhead.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. There is another resolution on the table, and I wonder whether, before this debate proceeds, we could have unanimous consent for the passage of that resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was about to refer to something the Senator from Idaho said yesterday, and I thought perhaps he was rising to correct his remarks. That was one reason why I yielded to him.

Yesterday the Senator from Arizona, after discussing the matter which was before the Senate, declined to yield at one time when two Senators on this side of the aisle addressed him, and replied as follows:

I will not yield for a moment, because I am going to make a sort of legal argument.

Whereupon he proceeded to refer to the fact that he had been convinced for some 12 years "that the greatest contribution anyone could make to our American system of government would be to assist in having adopted a constitutional amendment which would provide, after its adoption, that all amendments to the Constitution shall be ratified by a direct vote of the people in the several States, voting separately."

In reply to a remark which I made asking him whether he had made any effort to secure a report on a joint resolution of my own, which is now before the Judiciary Committee, he said he had not, because he was more interested in his own constitutional amendment, and then went on to say:

I introduced a similar joint resolution more than 10 years ago and it was defeated in the Senate.

I think the Senator's memory in that regard is not quite accurate, although, as I was not here, I have to rely on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. A search of the RECORD reveals that in 1924, some eight years ago, the Senator did introduce an amendment in terms similar to those of the one introduced at the same time by Senator Wadsworth, a distinguished Senator from New York, no longer a Member of this body. It was Senator Wadsworth's resolution that was reported out to the Senate by my distinguished predecessor, Senator Brandegee. I happened to be present on the day the debate took place, and took great interest in it, because I have for some time, like the Senator from Arizona, been interested in that very proposition. In fact, the Senator from New York, Mr. Wadsworth, had made a speech in Connecticut the preceding summer in which he advocated the very amendment in which the Senator from Arizona is interested.

According to the RECORD, it was the resolution of the Senator from New York which came before the Senate, and not the resolution of the Senator from Arizona. It was not defeated, except indirectly, by being referred back to the committee, after a debate which I found very interesting, and I have no doubt others did also.

The Senator from Arizona went on to say how badly he felt at the time of that defeat, and his determination to continue his efforts in support of a proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator please give the date of my remarks expressing my regret?

Mr. BINGHAM. I was quoting from a statement of the Senator from Arizona made on yesterday.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I may be in error; still I doubt it, because I yield to no man on the question of memory. My resolution was No. 17, and I recall distinctly arguing in behalf of the resolution which I proposed that constitutional amendments should be ratified by vote of the people in the several States. I recall that the Judiciary Committee considered it. It might be, however, that in the course of events even this memory of mine might have slipped a cog, and it might be the regrets I expressed over its defeat at that time were because of the defeat of the Wadsworth amendment; but, as I recall, I was not enamored of the Wadsworth amendment, because it provided not for a vote, if I remember correctly, directly by the people in each State but had some qualification to it that it could not be ratified by the legislature unless and until one-half of the membership of the legislature had been elected after its submission. I realize how uncertain and how almost futile it is to debate a matter that happened 10 years ago that I have not looked up since, so if the Senator from Connecticut has looked it up I yield to the RECORD.

Mr. BINGHAM. It was not my intention to point out that the Senator was mistaken in regard to his own resolution but rather to point out a slight error in his observation that I was a "new convert" in the field. The Senator said:

While, of course, I welcome such new converts as the Senator from Connecticut, I was a gleaner in the field.

I have already given the Senator the interpretation of the word "gleaner" as one who collects in small quantities.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope the Senator will not embarrass me by referring to the fact that I should have said something else instead of "gleaner."

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator went on to say:

I was breaking the stubborn glebe and planting the crop and harvesting it with my perspiration long before my scholarly friend began to agitate the ratification of proposed constitutional amendments by the people.

I merely want to state for the benefit of the Senator, who has always been extremely courteous and kind to me as he is to everyone else, that in April, 1924, at about the very time when the amendment in which he was interested—which my recollection was had been introduced by former Senator Wadsworth, but might have been the one introduced by the Senator from Arizona—was being considered, I had delivered an address before the Republican State convention in Hartford in which I said:

We are in favor of an amendment to the Constitution providing in effect that future constitutional amendments proposed to the several States should be submitted to the electors of the States for ratification instead of to the legislatures. Such an amendment was introduced into the Congress several years ago by the senior Senator from Connecticut, Senator Brandegee. It was debated on several occasions, but its importance was not recognized by Congress and, although reported favorably by unanimous vote of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, it failed to come to vote in the Senate.

Just after the Senator from Arizona had made his remark about the fact that he was "breaking the stubborn glebe and planting the crop and harvesting it" before I began to take any interest in it—although it was at the very same time—the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] interrupted to say:

If the Senator will examine the proposed constitutional amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut he will observe that the Senator from Connecticut has not yet caught up with the proposition that the Senator from Arizona has offered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BINGHAM. In just a minute. The Senator's zeal outran his knowledge of my amendment at that point, as it has done once or twice at other times. If he will compare the resolution with Senate Joint Resolution 32, which I offered on December 9, I think he will correct his statement in the RECORD. Let me read the resolution as offered by the Senator from Arizona sentence by sentence in comparison with that offered by myself. I read first from the resolution offered by the Senator from Arizona:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments—

I will now read from my own resolution—

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments——

Mr. ASHURST. I do not understand the Senator. He is reading from the Constitution now?

Mr. BINGHAM. I read first from the resolution offered by the Senator from Arizona and then from the resolution offered by myself.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator begin with line 1 of my resolution and read it? I want to follow him.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 14745.

Mr. ASHURST. But will the Senator read from the resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. In just a moment. I wanted to read from the first three lines in order that everyone might see that they are identical. I will now read the second three lines, and this, of course, is the important and significant part:

Which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the vote of the qualified electors in three-fourths of the several States.

That is the Senator's resolution. Now I will read from my own.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall not yield until I finish this comment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will suspend. For what purpose does the Senator from Nebraska interrupt?

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I decline to yield until I can get this comparison plainly before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr. President; I can not yield for the present moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator from Idaho observed that I had not yet caught up with the proposition which the Senator from Arizona had offered, and I am now, due to interruption, obliged to read again the sentence from the resolution of the Senator from Arizona, which is the key to the situation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a statement?

Mr. BINGHAM. As soon as I have completed this comparison. I read again:

Which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the vote of the qualified electors in three-fourths of the several States.

Now I read from my own resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has read that once.

Mr. BINGHAM. I propose to read it again:

Which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the vote of the qualified electors in three-fourths of the several States.

In other words, it is word for word as that of the Senator from Arizona. There is this difference, that in the next three lines of my resolution I provide a little more leeway for the people to make the change, and I add these words:

That until three-fourths of the States shall have ratified or more than one-fourth of the States shall have rejected or defeated the proposed amendment, any State in like manner may change its vote.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point? I think the Senator should yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let me finish my statement first, please.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GLASS. What is before the Senate besides the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BINGHAM. There are three or four other Senators before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. GLASS. What is before the Senate that he is discussing?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question now?

Mr. BINGHAM. I must first yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has indeed pointed out the difference between my proposed amendment and his own. The Senator's may be better than mine, but the Senator out of mental honesty, and I know he possesses that, ought to admit there is a difference between the two.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not claiming there is no difference.

Mr. ASHURST. I contemplated in December using the precise language the Senator used, to wit, that unless and until a majority—that is, the required constitutional majority of three-fourths—had ratified, any State could change its vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then the Senator and I are after exactly the same thing.

Mr. ASHURST. I had that provision in the one I prepared in December last year, which I did not introduce. After reflection for some months I came to the conclusion that that language was not necessary, because a ratifying State now has the right at any time to withdraw its ratification, provided such withdrawal is before three-fourths of the States shall have ratified, so I left that out of mine.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I say to the Senator that when, if ever, we get this resolution out of the Judiciary Committee and the Senator offers as an amendment to strike out those words I shall have no objection, because I have the highest regard for his erudition in the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. In a moment. All I was trying to do was to show that the remark of the Senator from Idaho was not well founded and that his zeal outran the facts in the case.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has read both resolutions, and I still maintain that the Senator had not caught up with the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. BINGHAM. In what regard?

Mr. BORAH. In regard to the last clause of the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. The last clause of the amendment is precisely the same in both cases.

Mr. BORAH. I mean the one with reference to withdrawal.

Mr. BINGHAM. The last clause is, "Provided, That no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

Mr. BORAH. I do not have it before me, but I refer to the clause the Senator read just a moment ago, which the Senator from Arizona said he did not believe ought to be incorporated in his resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the portion to which the Senator referred?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. O Mr. President!

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. BINGHAM. In just a moment. According to the statement made by the Senator from Arizona, he had considered it and decided it was not necessary. In that regard it is true I was way, way behind him, and I therefore offer my apologies to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BINGHAM. I had not supposed it was that to which the Senator from Idaho referred. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator in favor of the pending resolution?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is endeavoring to call attention——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will, if the Senator will give me time, and I believe I have the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; unfortunately, the Senator has.

Mr. BINGHAM. And unfortunately the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has had various resolutions before him for four or five months which he has made no effort to report back to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; and now the Senator is talking about a motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of the resolution. If the Senator wants that, all he has to do is to sit down and the resolution will pass. But he does not want to pass the resolution. He is arguing for something that he, himself, is anxious to block by talking until 2 o'clock. That is the secret of it all.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is entirely incorrect if he thinks I do not want it to pass.

Mr. NORRIS. Then let us vote on it and pass it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I propose to discuss it for some time, and the Senator is not going to defeat that purpose by constantly interrupting me.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize that.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I want to suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that the Senator from Arizona reached his conclusion——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. Just a moment, please.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COUZENS. How long can a Senator hold the floor and allow interruptions of this kind to continue indefinitely?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As long as no one objects.

Mr. COUZENS. I object to the interruptions of the Senator from Connecticut and to his yielding the floor indefinitely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut may not yield except for a question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for a question.

Mr. GORE. And I will put it in the form of a question. It is as to whether or not our experience in the ratification of the fifteenth amendment does not demonstrate that the contrary rule has either been adopted or acquiesced in? I may be in error, but I submit that is my memory.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to answer that?

Mr. GORE. If the Senator will permit me to conclude my question, he then may answer. I may be in error, but as I recall, both Ohio and New Jersey——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Connecticut has lost the floor by yielding to the Senator from Oklahoma to make a speech.

Mr. GORE. I am asking a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Oklahoma is asking a question.

Mr. NORRIS. No one else understands it that way.

Mr. GORE. I will ask whether or not I am in error in my recollection that Ohio and New Jersey ratified the fifteenth amendment, and afterwards withdrew and revoked their ratification, and yet the amendment was promulgated as having been validly ratified, when, subtracting those two States, the required three-fourths' majority would not have been on record as favoring the amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for the purpose of answering that question?

Mr. GORE. I should like to have it answered. I may be in error in my memory about it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, if I should yield, I would lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will lose the floor if he yields for a speech.

Mr. BINGHAM. I regret that, under the ruling of the Chair and under the objection of the Senator from Michigan, I can not yield to my friend from Arizona.

Mr. President, this interruption has taken us somewhat far afield from the matter before us. The Senator from New Jersey has made a motion to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of a joint resolution which has been before the committee for some months. The Senator from Nebraska, due to his desire to facilitate business, has stated that he has no objection to that; but the Senator from Nebraska and the other members of the Judiciary Committee have postponed for a very considerable period any report on Senate bill 308, Senate bill 309, Senate bill 314, Senate bill 422, Senate bill 2415, Senate bill 2462, Senate bill 2478, Senate bill 3148, Senate Joint Resolution 31, Senate Joint Resolution 84, Senate Joint Resolution 90, and Senate Joint Resolution 128, all bills and joint resolutions relative to the prohibition act and the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield for a question.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to propound to the eminent Senator from Connecticut a question as to the relationship of the pending bank bill to the subject matter he is bringing to the attention of the Senate. I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he feels that his efforts, being made in connection with the pending bank bill, are to seize hold of the frozen assets of the bottles and beer barrels and to make them liquid, and if he thinks his services in this connection would work that result under a home-loan bank bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in reply to my charming and delightful friend from Illinois, to whom I always listen with the greatest pleasure, and whose remarkable vocabulary and most felicitous choice of language are always appreciated by his colleagues, who always listen to him as gratefully as they would welcome a cooling breeze in a desert on a hot day [laughter]——

Mr. LEWIS. I can not consent, Mr. President, to assume that my friend, in view of his attitude, is a sheik upon a desert which is so dry. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I regret that I am in danger of losing the floor if I yield to any felicitous observations from my friend from Illinois. I will say to him that I am not at the present moment discussing the question to which he refers. I am discussing the question of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the motion before us to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from one of the various resolutions calling for repeal.

I regret that my good friend from Illinois, now that he has reminded me of it, took occasion yesterday to refer in somewhat slighting terms, if I may use that word not too harshly, or in terms, perhaps I may better say, of charming irony and ridicule, to any attempt at this time to bring forward a modification of the Volstead Act. The Senator from Illinois referred to his own opposition to the eighteenth amendment when he was previously a Member of this body and his unavailing opposition to the Volstead Act at that time. The Senator from Illinois, however, made reference to those of us who are trying to secure immediate modification of the Volstead Act and who had been working toward that end for some time previous to any declaration by either political party, and he yesterday took the position that to bring the question up at this time in connection with a bill to provide loans for persons desiring to retain or to build homes was, in a way, rather a contemptible proceeding. He suggested that we ought not to hang a keg of beer on the doorknob of the workingman who was endeavoring to build a home. He implied that he would be very glad to indulge in a friendly glass of beer at some time during the summer, but that this did not seem to him an appropriate time to do so. My friend's tone and his general remarks were of a nature to make me believe, although I may be doing him an injustice, that he did not take this question quite as seriously as some of us do. He chose to raise the risibles of the audience by referring to the froth and the charm of beer, and so forth, just as though the only object we had in view in seeking to modify the Volstead Act was to obtain the pleasure of drinking a glass of beer for the sociability that might ensue therefrom.

At an appropriate time, but, out of respect for my friend from Nebraska, I shall not do so at the present moment, I intend to point out to the Senator from Illinois and to any others who may do me the honor to listen that our reason for favoring immediate modification of the Volstead Act—and I assume the reason for the Democratic Party placing in their platform the plank calling for immediate modification of the Volstead Act and to permit the manufacture of beer—was not the pleasing vision which the Senator from Illinois held up before us, but, rather, that we believe in its economic importance. We believe that if to-day the Volstead Act were modified, to-morrow thousands of men could find jobs who can not find them now, and within a few weeks tens and hundreds of thousands of men could find jobs. We believe that within a year 100,000 farmers would be raising grain in order to provide the 100,000,000 bushels of grain needed by the breweries. We believe that it would be the turning point in the economic depression. We believe further that it would raise hundreds of millions of dollars of revenue for the Government and help us to balance the Budget. It is for those reasons, Mr. President, that we are urging its immediate modification.

May I say to the Senator, with all due respect, if the return of beer will do those things, which we believe it will do and which I believe he also agrees with us it will do, that it will give the workingman a chance to buy a home; it will give the workingman a chance to buy a home on the installment plan; whereas the bill which was before us when the Senator from Illinois made his remarks merely gives him a chance to borrow money but gives him nothing with which to pay the interest on the loan or the principal thereof. Therefore it seems to me, Mr. President, that we are on sound ground in endeavoring to annex this measure as a rider to a bill intended to provide and save homes.

I can not agree with the Senator that the only object is to increase the enjoyment of certain people in the summer time or that the only object is to bring the beer barrel to the hearths of the homes of the land, as it was so charmingly suggested by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] in an effort to prove that he does not know where beer is kept. If anyone ever saw a beer barrel on the hearth of a home it must have been in Virginia; it certainly was not in Connecticut. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The galleries must observe the rules of the Senate and refrain from any demonstrations.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, any effort to minimize the important economic effect of this measure or to belittle the contention that it will really enable the people to build homes, that it will really enable them to earn money with which to keep their homes, seems to me to be unworthy of my very distinguished and delightful friend from Illinois.

Mr. President, yesterday morning in the Washington News there was printed an editorial, which I understand appeared in all the Scripps-Howard newspapers, addressed to Franklin D. Roosevelt, from which I read as follows:

The Democratic platform, which you accepted "100 per cent," says:

"Pending repeal, we favor immediate modification of the Volstead Act to legalize the manufacture and sale of beer and other beverages of such alcoholic content as is permissible under the Constitution, and to provide therefrom a proper and needed revenue."

Immediate modification has been proposed in Congress. Certain Democratic leaders in that body seem determined to wait until after election.

Do you as the party's nominee and leader, in light of the wording of the document and of your complete approval thereof, approve of waiting, or do you interpret immediate as meaning now?

Yesterday afternoon the United Press carried this bulletin from Albany——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BINGHAM. I can yield only for a question, and I should like to read the answer made in the afternoon before I yield to the Senator even for a question. In the afternoon the United Press carried this bulletin from Albany:

ALBANY, N. Y., July 7.—Franklin D. Roosevelt let it be known to-day that action upon the prohibition question was squarely up to Congress.

Sources close to the governor reiterated that he stands firmly behind a plank in the Democratic Party's platform calling for repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

He was quoted as saying, in answering editorial comment—

And I assume that the editorial which I have read is the particular one referred to—

"It is up to the Congressmen to act as they see fit."

A spokesman for the governor pointed out that the Democratic nominee already has pledged his support to the entire platform and that "he can not run Congress."

Roosevelt refused to become embroiled in any controversy over interpretation of the party's wet plank—whether he favored immediate action by Congress or was content to wait.

Attachés of Roosevelt's executive office said he was "attending strictly to State business and that he could not run two jobs at once."

Roosevelt indicated he would not lead any fight on the highly controversial prohibition question at this session of Congress.

It was recalled, however, that the governor commented thusly when John D. Rockefeller, jr., wrote his letter to Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, urging repeal of the eighteenth amendment:

"Mr. Rockefeller's letter undoubtedly will help get action on the prohibition question at this session of Congress without having to await the convening of another session."

Now I yield to the Senator from Illinois for a question.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire seriously to invite the thought of the eminent Senator from Connecticut to this idea and query——

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield for a question.

Mr. LEWIS. Assuming that the amendment presented by the Senator may be attached by a vote of the Senate to the pending home loan bank bill, does the Senator believe that the President of the United States would allow the measure to pass without veto? Does the Senator not recognize that it would be vetoed by the President, and thus, in view of the limited time remaining for the session, cause us to lose both the bank bill and the advantage, as it is called in the application of the word, to the poor and to others of the beer amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. I reply to the Senator as I replied to a similar question yesterday, that I do not know what the President would do with it; that he has not communicated with me nor I with him in this regard. I have seen a dispatch from one of the news services that he would veto it. I inquired of another news service, but found they had been unable to confirm that information. But, Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BINGHAM. In just a moment I will yield to my friend.

Mr. President, it seems to me that our duties as legislators are distinct from the duty of the Executive in his capacity to veto any measure, and, personally, and with all due respect to the President of the United States for whom I have a very high regard in his exalted position, I would deem it something out of the ordinary and decidedly not in conformity with our Constitution for him, in view of my interest in certain legislation, to call me up or to write to me or to send to me and tell me that if I persisted in the advocacy of a certain measure and it were passed, he would veto it. I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Since the Senator is so much concerned about the attitude of Governor Roosevelt, who is not yet President, why does he not make some investigation and inquiry and ascertain the attitude of his candidate, who is now President?

Mr. BINGHAM. My only interest in Governor Roosevelt's opinion was that he has just been chosen by his party as the leader of his party; and as the leader of his party it was to be expected, and apparently was so claimed by the editors of the Scripps-Howard service, that he ought to indicate to the members of his party his desire that they act promptly in this regard. That was the only reason why I referred to it, because I am sure the Senator from Texas will not deny the fact that the Governor of New York is at present the titular leader of the Democratic Party.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, of course, the Senator from Texas does not deny that Governor Roosevelt is the candidate of his party for President of the United States. He will not assume his duties until next March, however, and what the Senator from Connecticut wants is to do something now, when Governor Roosevelt can neither approve nor veto his beer bill.

Why does not the Senator, if he is sincere, find out what his own leader, his own President, and his own party associates will do with his bill or will not do with his bill on beer? Why does he not do that now—not next March, but now?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not my idea that it would be the duty of the Governor of New York, after and if he becomes President, to tell the Congress what to do; but as the leader of his party it was my idea that he might indicate to the members of his party that he desired them to interpret the word "immediate" as meaning now.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in view of the pronouncement which is being made by several of the Republican Senators who are so anxious to have Governor Roosevelt assume the leadership of the Nation at this time, I was wondering if there might not, in a spirit of compromise, be some method evolved, since it is so harmonious and we all realize how we need Roosevelt's leadership here now, so that we might make his election immediate, and immediately end the abominable situation afflicting the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, in connection with this discussion, I think it is fair to point out to the Senate that a judge in New Jersey first called the attention of the country, in a decision a year ago, to the fact that these questions should be submitted to conventions rather than to the legislatures of the States.

I have here a letter which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune, on the 17th of June, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD, in regard to Judge Clark.

Judge Clark, a distinguished United States judge of the State of New Jersey, has a very distinguished ancestry. His grandfather, J. Donald Cameron, was a United States Senator from Pennsylvania from 1877 to 1897, and his great-grandfather, Simon Cameron, was also a member of the United States Senate from Pennsylvania from 1845 to 1849, from 1857 to 1861, and from 1867 to 1877, so that members of his family were Members of the Senate from before the Civil War down to 1897. I therefore ask that this article may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

CREDIT TO JUDGE CLARK

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

In all of the claims put forth as to the original authorship of the various proposals for reconsideration of the prohibition problem, culminating at present in the plank adopted by the Republican National Convention, I see no mention of credit being given to Judge Clark, of New Jersey, whose famous decision that the eighteenth amendment is unconstitutional was so promptly overruled by the Supreme Court.

Judge Clark based his decision upon the ground that, although the Constitution provides for two methods of ratification of a proposed amendment by the States, such provision basically is for the purpose of enabling the people of the country, by States, to adopt or reject any proposed amendment. He therefore held that the provisions of Article V of the Constitution should be interpreted in the light of the conditions as the original framers found them and also the conditions of modern times.

At the time of the adoption of the original Constitution, ratification by State legislatures reflected accurately the opinion of the people as a whole. But the framers of the Constitution wisely provided an alternative method of State conventions, elected for the sole purpose of considering the one question of amendment or repeal, and nothing else. Their obvious intent was to provide for an unbiased expression of opinion on the part of the people themselves if, for any reason, such expression could not be procured through the medium of State legislatures.

Judge Clark held that in the case of the eighteenth amendment certain of the State legislatures had been elected before the question was presented, and that, therefore, their members were not elected with the eighteenth amendment as an issue before their constituents. He also held that in the cases of other State legislatures whose members had been elected after the question had been presented, other issues aside from the proposed eighteenth amendment had been before their constituents, and that, therefore, their election could not be considered as an expression of the will of the people on that single question. He held that the eighteenth amendment had not been ratified by the people of the country, and, interpreting the Constitution along broad and basic lines, that the eighteenth amendment was therefore unconstitutional.

At the time of the reversal of this decision by the Supreme Court the opinion was generally expressed, editorially and otherwise, that although the Supreme Court's decision was to be expected in view of its previous decisions on somewhat similar questions, future proposed amendments or questions of repeal should and would be placed before State conventions elected for the sole purpose of considering the single question proposed.

It is extraordinarily interesting to note that, except for some of the proposals by the so-called drys, no proposal of any importance has been made for the reconsideration of the eighteenth amendment which does not contain the specific condition that the question of further amendment or repeal shall be passed upon by State conventions and not by State legislatures. The drys have an obvious reason for preferring State legislatures, which in itself supports Judge Clark in his opinion.

Judge Clark's decision, although reversed by the Supreme Court, has had and will continue to have the most far-reaching effect upon the Government of the United States in relation to its Constitution. No matter what plan is adopted as a solution to the prohibition problem, the "Clark plan" appears to be unquestioned as to its wisdom and soundness.

BRADFORD B. LOCKE.

NEW YORK, June 17, 1932.

Mr. SHEPPARD obtained the floor.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Out of order, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. It is Order of Business No. 1076, House bill 7293, the last bill on page 12 of the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be stated for the information of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, what is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business No. 1076.

Mr. NORRIS. I object to that, Mr. President. This is the morning hour. If Senators are going to filibuster against this resolution calling on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a report, let us make them do so up to the end. Let the filibuster go on until 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that the decision by Judge Clark to which the Senator from New Jersey has referred was overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States, and declared by that tribunal of last resort to be without foundation.

I shall not detain the Senate beyond the time required for a few comments upon some of the objections to the eighteenth amendment, inasmuch as a motion is now pending to discharge the Judiciary Committee from the consideration of an amendment repealing or changing that amendment.

To the claim that national prohibition was adopted without due deliberation when public interest was absorbed in war, I need but reply that a majority of the American people, occupying three-fourths of American territory, were living under prohibition by States and localities when the eighteenth amendment was submitted. Those States and localities had reached a status favorable to prohibition after decades and decades of consideration, discussion, and experience. It was the desire of this majority to remove the handicaps suffered from the inflow of liquors from a few wet States that formed one of the principal causes of the adoption of national prohibition.

To the claim that prohibition interferes with individualism and individual liberty, I need but reply that the liquor habit is a menace to both, a menace which multiplied millions of the human race are unable to resist.

No drunkard can make effective use of individual initiative, liberty, and opportunity. Neither may the steady or moderate drinker, with faculties weakened and impaired, make the best possible use of these attributes.

Liquor propagandists attribute to prohibition almost every ill that befalls this Nation, the tides of lawlessness, disorder, and immorality that have swept this country and the world following the horror and the strain of world-wide war. If the saloons had been open during the postwar period the imagination can not encompass the economic and moral chaos that would have ensued. Crime waves will be more rampant, and riots will border on revolution, in the event the eighteenth amendment is repealed.

Before the war, whenever public order was threatened the authorities would at once close the saloons. The eighteenth amendment has already closed them, and will keep them closed when the disturbances which now seem about to occur, bloody as they probably will be, come upon us.

To the claim that prohibition enforcement is a farce, let me point to the status of enforcement.

A law may be said to be effectively enforced when a majority of the people approve it, and when a majority of indictments against offenders result in conviction. Such is undoubtedly the case with national prohibition.

Let me point to the material benefits of national prohibition.

The eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act mark a new epoch in the economic as well as the moral history of the world; the suppression, so far as the United States is concerned, of alcohol as an intoxicant, and its promotion as an industrial material of almost universal beneficence and importance. The industrial uses of alcohol in its native undrinkable state are numbered by thousands, notably in the manufacture of numberless articles necessary to civilized life, including glass, rubber, fertilizer, dyes, surgical materials, and medical appliances; in the preservation of medicines and specimens in hospitals, laboratories, and museums; in the production of fuel, heat, light, and power. Prohibition has not only turned alcohol itself into constructive channels, but also the funds formerly expended for it, and the plants which housed it when it was a legalized intoxicant.

The application of liquor money to a higher and better end has been reflected during national prohibition in the largest savings deposits and the largest general deposits in American banks in all our history. In fact, the only bright spot in the depression through which the country is now struggling is the fact that savings deposits have held their own, and in fact have increased to some extent, despite the general backwardness in connection with all other industries and enterprises.

As a result of the eighteenth amendment we see public drunkenness disappearing, wrecks and rounders of former days turned into useful workers; properties formerly occupied by liquor interests and kindred evils devoted to important business and industrial activities, with increased enhancement in value; maintenance of fewer public charges due to drink; better home conditions; more comfort for mothers and children; an unprecedented decline in the national death rate, equivalent to the saving of millions of lives since 1920. We have but to stand our ground to make sure of the retention of the eighteenth amendment and its tremendous benefits.

We have but to renew our determination to maintain our prohibition laws, to sustain our officials in the enforcement of these laws, and all will continue to be well for prohibition.

The arrest of a bootlegger, the capture of a drinking party, the seizure of illicit liquor, are proclaimed in the headlines of the newspapers. The fact that millions of pay checks are going every Saturday night to mothers and children instead of to the saloon receives no notice at all.

Alcohol as a beverage is a source of infinite injury to human beings. It imperils the human resources of our country. I know that we may boast of material assets surpassing in many respects those of the remainder of the globe, of banks, mines, and mighty structures, factories, railways, and other forms of mechanical power, of a productive capacity unequaled by any other nation; but above and beyond all these, in true and real value are the men, the women, and the children of this Republic.

The waste in human resources occasioned by beverage alcohol did more perhaps to bring about national prohibition than any other single cause.

Mr. President, beverage alcohol is a squanderer of morals, intellect, and will. When recognized and authorized by law, its victims multiply to such extent as to undermine the mental, spiritual, and physical qualities which constitute the foundations of society. It weakens the processes of nutrition and reduces or destroys physical strength and skill, on which men and women must depend for the earning of subsistence, the support of families, the acquisition and the maintenance of homes.

It transforms humanity into inhumanity. It merges man into the beast. Under its influence men beat and starve and kill their loved ones. It wrecks ambition, crushes self-respect, and puts sanity to flight. It annihilates normal sentiments and emotions. It may easily be said to be one of the chief scourges of the human race. To say that it should not be forbidden by law and fought by every weapon at our command is to deny our duty both to God and to mankind.

The fight against this evil took on an intensive character when increased population, increased production, increased capital, increased chances for gain, made possible by the machine age, developed, among other expansions of production, the manufacture of intoxicants to an extent that threatened serious consequences to our civilization. With deepening intensity the conflict raged from year to year, the opponents of liquor scoring a major victory in 1919 by writing prohibition into the Constitution of the United States.

Thus we captured liquor's most important position in this continuous warfare against one of the most dangerous forms of evil. That position we intend to hold; and I propose to resist any effort to put in motion any movement against the eighteenth amendment unless specifically instructed to pursue an opposite course by the people of my own State.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the pending question is on a motion to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary. As far as I know, there is not a single vote in the Senate opposed to it. As I notified the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] when he started his speech, that so far as I knew there was no opposition, and I was perfectly willing to vote for his motion to discharge the committee. But he continued to speak. Then came the Senator from Connecticut, making a speech on the motion to discharge the committee, which he favored, of course. He was complaining in his speech because the resolution had not been reported before. I asked him to sit down and let us agree to the motion. I was for the adoption of the motion. But after listening to the Senator from Connecticut make his speech in favor of it, I became convinced that it ought not to be agreed to. So, Mr. President, I feel it my duty to take up a little of the time the Senate would have devoted to the defeating of the resolution against which they are really filibustering by taking the time between 12 and 2 o'clock.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. Will the Senator yield in order that I may note the absence of a quorum?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not care to have a quorum called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senator will absolve me from any desire to filibuster. I thought it necessary to make a brief reply to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. NORRIS. The real resolution to be brought up, following the motion to discharge the committee, was my resolution, Senate Resolution 260, reading as follows:

Resolved, That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be, and it is hereby, directed to report to the Senate a complete and detailed list of all loans which have been made by said corporation, giving, in each instance, the name of the person, firm, or corporation to whom or to which such loans have been made; the date of maturity; the rate of interest; and the nature of the security taken for the making of all such loans.

The said Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further directed to report to the Senate all commitments and agreements for the making of any loans which have not been completed, giving, in each instance, the terms, conditions, and rate of interest in regard to such proposed commitments or agreements.

If the motion to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary had been agreed to, the resolution I have just read would automatically have come before the Senate. But under the rules of the Senate it would have had to be disposed of before 2 o'clock. So these great statesmen, particularly the champion filibusterer from Connecticut, resolved to filibuster on something they wanted themselves in order to take up time and defeat something they did not want. They did not have the courage, they did not have the bravery, they did not have the honesty and the fairness to fight the resolution to which they were really opposed, but, under cover of another measure, they are trying to shield the railroads, the corporations, the banks, the insurance companies, and other corporations from disclosing to the people of the United States the money they got from the taxpayers' pockets. That is the object of it all.

Mr. CONNALLY. And to shield the board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, too.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. That has been the object of this debate. They figured that if they continued it until just before 2 o'clock, then they would get the motion they favored agreed to, which would take them only a minute or two, and kill the other measure, which they did not want.

Under the guise of killing the resolution I have read the filibuster has taken place over a motion to which nobody objects, or to which nobody did object before the Senator from Connecticut made his speech, but he was so eloquent, so forceful, so logical, in the great, statesmanlike oration he delivered, that he convinced me that I was wrong when I favored it, and so I am not going to let it pass.

Mr. BINGHAM. So I really accomplished something.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator really accomplished something. He accomplished something else, of course, for the time being at least, he really accomplished something.

Mr. President, the Senator had an opportunity to make a speech on beer, something which he has not done for several hours in the Senate. That was another thing he accomplished. The Senator from Connecticut is never happy unless he is waving a beer bottle in each hand. [Laughter.] When he can, by any pretext whatever, get an opportunity to exhibit his knowledge of beer, he never forgets to take the opportunity.

The argument was made on a motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a resolution which the Senator from Connecticut pretended in his eloquent speech he had been so anxious to have the committee act on, for months and months, weeping bitter tears of regret because the Committee on the Judiciary did not act, and now, when the opportunity comes, and a motion is made to discharge the committee, and the committee says, "All right, we are perfectly willing to take it up and put it on the calendar and bring it up for a vote," immediately the Senator gets a weak heart and talks his dear old beer resolution to death.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I have been detained in a committee hearing, and inasmuch as the Senator from Nebraska has been converted against his own conviction by a speech made in favor of this motion, may I assume that he will probably occupy the floor until 2 o'clock?

Mr. NORRIS. Probably. If the Senator would like to talk a little while, he may do so, and I can get the floor again. I will yield to the Senator, if he desires to talk.

Mr. LONG. No; I just wanted to be certain that the Senator was going to talk until that time.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the rules, I can speak twice on a resolution. This is my first speech. It is now 4 minutes to 2, and if the Senator wants to speak for 2 or 3 minutes, I will yield.

Mr. LONG. No; I prefer that the Senator go on.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I realize the force of what the Senator has said—the very impressive force. Why can we not take up the unfinished business and go on with it?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will see if we can not do that. I ask unanimous consent that the pending motion and also the Senate Resolution 260, which I offered—the real resolution—be sent to the calendar, the same as though we had debated them until 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Now we can go on with the unfinished business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 462) making an appropriation to provide transportation to their homes for veterans of the World War temporarily quartered in the District of Columbia, and it was signed by the Vice President.

HOME-LOAN BANKS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas obtained the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to perfect the amendment by offering another as a substitute for the amendment which I submitted last night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substitute will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Connecticut offers the following amendment, to be inserted on page 39 after line 19:

That the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, is amended in the following respects:

(a) By striking out the words "one-half of 1 per cent or more" wherever they appear in such act and inserting in lieu thereof the words "more than 3.45 per cent."

(b) By striking out the words "less than one-half of 1 per cent" wherever they appear in such act and inserting in lieu thereof the words "not more than 3.45 per cent."

(c) By striking out the words "more than one-half of 1 per cent" wherever they appear in such act and inserting in lieu thereof the words "more than 3.45 per cent."

(d) By striking out the words "below such one-half of 1 per cent" wherever they appear in such act, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "to 3.45 per cent or less."

(e) By striking out the words "and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter" where they appear in section 1 of Title II of such act and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and is otherwise denominated than as ale."

SEC. 2. Any offense in violation of, or any right, obligation, or penalty, or any seizure or forfeiture based upon any provision of the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, or upon any regulation or permit issued thereunder, committed, accruing, made, or incurred prior to the time this act takes effect, may be prosecuted or enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 3. All permits issued under the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, before this act takes effect, shall be valid with respect to intoxicating liquor as hereinbefore defined in this act, to the same extent as such permits are, at the time this act takes effect, valid with respect to inoxicating liquor as defined by law prior to the enactment of this act.

SEC. 4. Title II of the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 40. All fermented liquors brewed or manufactured, and taxable under the provisions of section 608 of the revenue act of 1918, and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, shall be packed in cases of pint bottles of 16 fluid ounces content, such cases to contain 1 dozen, 2 dozen, or 4 dozen such bottles each. Each case and individual bottle shall be marked, branded, and labeled in such manner as the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury shall, jointly, by regulations prescribe, and all sales by brewers and dealers in fermented liquors shall be in the original package or case so marked, branded, or labeled. Such fermented liquors may be removed from such package or case for use in any public place only by legitimate hotels and restaurants and for the sole purpose of serving such liquors in the dining rooms of such establishments in the pint bottle with meals."

SEC. 5. This title shall take effect at the end of the thirtieth day after the passage of this act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is my intention, unless a substitute amendment shall be adopted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, to move to refer this amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to permit me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Dale	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Dickinson	Kean	Schall
Bingham	Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Black	Fess	Keyes	Shipstead

Coolidge	Hayden	Nye	Watson
Copeland	Hebert	Patterson	White
Costigan	Howell	Pittman

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, for many months the Congress has been in session. The work of the Congress has been prolonged already beyond the period that any of us anticipated a short time ago. There are without doubt some measures upon which it will be necessary to have final action before an adjournment sine die can be obtained. There is pending before the Senate a conference report on the unemployment relief bill. May I say now, preparatory to some suggestions which may be made later, that it is expected that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report not later than at an early hour after convening to-morrow. It is possible that the subject may be taken up this afternoon.

A great deal of time during this session has been devoted to discussion of questions not immediately before the Senate. The entire day yesterday, with the exception of a single vote on the very important amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], was consumed in discussing the liquor question. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] was exerting his great intellectual resources, his powerful and effective processes of strategy, to incorporate in the home loan bank bill a provision legalizing the manufacture and sale of beer. The Senate adjourned yesterday in order to afford an opportunity during the morning hour of to-day to consider measures on the Calendar which are of vital importance and which perhaps can not receive consideration now, because of the fact that almost the entire two hours of the morning hour were wasted in the discussion of questions not immediately before the Senate. I realize from a long experience the freedom of debate which prevails here, the right of individual Senators to speak just as long as they please on any subject that they choose, and that when a Senator once takes the floor nobody but Almighty God can interrupt him, and that the Lord never seems to take any notice of him. [Laughter.]

It is a pathetic spectacle to observe the greatest deliberative body on earth withdrawing its attention and consideration from subjects and measures which are generally regarded as essential to the welfare of the Nation, to devote its time to questions upon which a vote can not be had, even though there were well-nigh unanimous consensus of opinion, to questions that are not before the Senate. It does not strengthen the confidence of the people of our Nation, in either the disposition or the ability of legislators to perform their functions in accordance with high standards, to present day after day and hour after hour the spectacle of discussing measures that are not before the Senate. I am fully conscious of the reply that can be made to this declaration.

It is proposed now to attach to the pending home loan bank bill an amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] which has no relation to the subject matter of the bill, an amendment which can not be agreed to in view of the situation that prevails here, an amendment that is intended to embarrass Members of this body by seeking to make it appear that Senators are unwilling to carry out the mandates of the platform recently adopted. It does not profit the people of the United States for me to point out to the Senator from Connecticut that the platform which his party adopted at Chicago is so ambiguous, so indefinite, so uncertain, that the greatest straddler in the world may stand on it in front of or behind another great straddler who takes exactly a contrary view from that taken by the first straddler. [Laughter.] It does not depend on the Senator from Connecticut that Democrats, if the people of this Nation give their approval to the Democratic candidates, shall carry out their platform. I for one grow very suspicious of an effort by the Senator from Connecticut to require me to conform to my platform. Everyone here realizes that the Constitution of the United States forbids the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages and that the real question in any legislation that can be presented while the Constitution remains unchanged is, What constitutes intoxicating beverages? If the Senator from Connecticut imagines that I or those associated closely with me are disposed to take his conclusions as to what constitutes an intoxicating beverage, he is greatly mistaken; he is asleep and due for an awakening.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Connecticut; but, Mr. President—no, on second thought I shall decline to yield. I witnessed yesterday the waste of a great deal of time in this Chamber by amusing and humorous interchanges or passages between the Senator from Connecticut and other Senators. It was difficult sometimes to determine the basis of the humor, but those possessed with acute intelligence avowed themselves ready to see something funny in the proceedings. This, however, is no time for the Senate to indulge in amusement.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the Senator permit me to correct a statement which the Senator has made? The statement the Senator just made in regard to the amount of alcohol in the amendment was correct as to the amendment as offered last night, but not correct as to the amendment which was offered this morning as a substitute therefor. That was because distinguished Senators on the other side of the aisle declared that they believed it would bring it within the constitutional limitation by asking for 2.75 per cent alcoholic content by weight. What I have offered is 3.45 per cent by volume, which is exactly the same thing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I said nothing about the amount of alcoholic content in the proposal of the Senator from Connecticut. I made the declaration, and I reaffirm it with all the emphasis at my command, that the Senator from Connecticut is not a qualified judge to determine what constitutes an intoxicating beverage; he does not know anything about it; he never had any experience with it; he is not a competent witness. [Laughter.] In all seriousness, this involves a scientific question. No one here objects to supporting a provision of law which would make lawful the manufacture and the sale of a non-intoxicating beverage. What we oppose is an effort to authorize the manufacture and sale of a beverage that may be determined by the highest authority to be intoxicating and in violation of the Constitution and of the oaths we have taken to support that instrument.

If amendments not really germane to the subject matter of this proposed legislation are to be incorporated in it, let us incorporate something that will be helpful in this time of distress; let us deal with this legislation seriously and effectively. Already the bill has been amended until its paternal ancestor can not recognize his child. It already has become an orphan by reason of the adoption of amendments proposed in this Chamber.

The Senator from Connecticut knows, and every other Senator who hears me knows, that if this amendment be incorporated in the home loan bank bill it will mean the death of the legislation. Senators may well find ground for opposition to the measure, but they ought not to seek to kill it by trying to have incorporated in it a provision that they know will invite a veto even should it pass the Senate and be agreed to in conference.

Why all this haste? Why is it that upon every bill that is brought forward here, whether it be a bill to provide for the relief of persons in distress or the erection of a courthouse at Podunk, the Senate is compelled to listen to hours of debate on an irrelevant subject pertaining to beer or liquor? What this Congress ought to do, in my humble judgment, is to dispose of this bill, dispose of the conference report on the relief bill, pass the Glass substitute for the Goldsborough bill, get the Army appropriation bill out of conference, dispose of that, and then provide for a quick adjournment. The country will be gratified; Senators will be relieved.

This liquor question has been made an issue in the national campaign. The effort now is to defeat the issue before it can be contested or determined. There is not anybody—I do not care how "wet" or how "dry" he may be—who expects to authorize the manufacture and sale of beer in connection with a measure which is designed to bring relief and assistance to millions of citizens who are having their homes sold from under them; who are threatened with the danger of seeing the small savings of a long lifetime of sacrifice and hard labor dissipated and of finding themselves set adrift without hope and without resources.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has indicated to me his intention to propose a substitute for the pending amendment. It is the Glass substitute for the Goldsborough bill. I hope he does that when the opportunity arises. It is true that it is not directly germane to the primary purposes of the pending bill, and yet in every practical sense it is germane to the objects of the measure. It contemplates a sound arrangement by which the currency of the Nation may be expended up to the amount of $995,000,000, and no more.

The declaration was made on the floor by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] that this provision would constitute an inflation to the amount of $14,000,000,000, because that is the amount of Government bonds in existence; but the Senator must know—he may have forgotten—that the amount of bonds which any bank may use for the purpose of note circulation is limited to the amount of its capital, and that under the provisions of the bill the aggregate of increase in circulation would be a little less that a billion dollars. There are many who believe that such a measure would comport with the policy of authorizing a system by which the citizens in distress may be able to save their homes. I do not see how anyone could oppose that amendment in favor of a beer amendment on this bill.

I hope that this body may devote itself to its labors and conclude them and adjourn in the very early future. I believe it will be approved by the public, and I know it will add to the comfort of those of us who have been here from day to day trying to solve the great problems which have been presented for our solution.

I am speaking earnestly, because I realize that the Senate of the United States, in a measure, has been discredited by the practices which have prevailed here. I am speaking earnestly, because I hope that throughout the remainder of this session we may devote ourselves to a fair consideration of the issues that are actually before us.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending amendment in the way of a substitute and ask the clerk to read it beginning in line 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut it is proposed to insert the following additional sections:

SEC. —. That notwithstanding any provisions of law prohibiting bonds of the United States from bearing the circulation privilege, for a period of five years from the date of enactment of this act all outstanding bonds of the United States heretofore issued or issued during such period shall be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issuance of circulating notes to national banking associations, and upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States by a national banking association of any such bonds such association shall be entitled to receive circulating notes in the same manner and to the same extent and subject to the same conditions and limitations now provided by law in the case of 2 per cent gold bonds of the United States bearing the circulation privilege; except that the limitation contained in section 9 of the act of July 12, 1882, as amended, with respect to the amount of lawful money which may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States by national banking associations for the purpose of withdrawing bonds held as security for their circulating notes, shall not apply to the bonds of the United States to which the circulation privilege is extended by this act and which are held as security for such notes. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to modify, amend, or repeal any law relating to bonds of the United States which now bear the circulation privilege.

SEC. —. As used in this act, the word "bonds" shall not include notes, certificates, or bills issued by the United States.

SEC. —. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Do I understand the Senator to offer his amendment as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, or as a substitute for it?

Mr. BORAH. It is offered in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. WATSON. For the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WATSON. Then, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry. If the motion of the Senator from Arkansas should prevail to refer the Bingham amendment——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I correct the Senator from Indiana, anticipating what he is about to say?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I announced that if the amendment of the Senator from Idaho did not prevail I would make a motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WATSON. But the Senator from Idaho, as I understand, is offering his amendment as a substitute for the Bingham amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and if the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho shall be agreed to, I shall not, of course, move to refer to the committee the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, but if the amendment of the Senator from Idaho shall not be agreed to, I shall then avail myself of the privilege of making that motion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this amendment will be recognized as a measure reported by the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] from the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am informed that the measure, as reported, had the unanimous support of that committee. I have offered it with the approval of the author.

Mr. President, I am somewhat confused and more or less resentful in regard to the method in which we are trying to legislate these days. Everyone naturally would prefer to have each measure stand upon its own merits, and survive or fall according to its merits; but in view of the mode which has been adopted with reference to this bill, and in view of the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], and in view of limited time in which we have before adjournment, I feel that I am justified in offering this amendment to this measure. I would urge it as a separate measure if I felt I would have an opportunity.

The amendment is, in my judgment, a very conservative one. It can by no means, it seems to me, be assailed as inflation in the objectionable sense in which that term is used. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has just stated the extent to which the currency may be increased under this bill. My own view is that while it is a step in the right direction, we shall have to go much farther before we shall have passed through our present period of depression. I urge it as a beginning.

This depression has been with us for nearly three years. There does not seem to be anything in the way of modification of its tendency. Unemployment is increasing; prices continue to fall; and the forces of deflation are advancing. Conditions are growing more and more serious.

I was conversing to-day with one of the great wheat raisers of the United States, perhaps the largest wheat raiser in the United States. He informed me that he was harvesting some 500,000 bushels of wheat, and that the price of his wheat on board the cars is 16 cents a bushel. By the time the freight is paid and the commission is paid for selling the wheat he will realize about 8 cents a bushel. The result is that with this vast holding, and producing something without which we can not live, he is unable to secure sufficient money to pay for harvesting his crop. We have reached the point where neither currency nor credit can be had for the producers of the things without which we can not live. Fifteen nations have already entered upon a system of barter and we seem tending in that direction.

It is said that the great World War cost us something like $35,000,000,000. It is now estimated that this deflation has cost us from $150,000,000,000 to $200,000,000,000. Any subject, therefore, or any matter which has any logical relationship with the great problem before us of how to arrest the tendencies of the present time must, it seems to me, be of much greater concern than either beer or red liquor. Indeed, it is the most vital problem of all problems, for upon its solution all else depends.

There are two schools with reference to the present depression or deflation. There are those who believe that it must run its course. They take the fatalistic view that there is little if anything we can do toward arresting the fall of prices and staying the tendencies of deflation, and that it must run its natural course. There are those who contend that any attempt to change its natural course will be futile. I do not belong to that school. I utterly reject this morbid doctrine. This depression was man made. Nature has not failed us, she has been bountiful. We are not the victims of flood or famine. We are the victims of unwise policies and by changing these policies we can greatly relieve the situation.

Prof. Gustave Cassel, an authority upon money and economic questions, in discussing this phase of the situation before an audience in Oxford, England, had this to say:

> Wherever in the world we look for help we only find an appalling lack both of insight and resolution. Those supposed to be in power proclaim themselves to be absolutely powerless in monetary matters and refuse to recognize any responsibility for the course of affairs. Thus chances are lost which perhaps will not recur.

There is another school taking the position that it is within the power of governments, particularly through the power over money which governments possess, to deal with the fall of prices, and thus to have some material and beneficial effect upon the depression itself. It is contended by this school of thought that through a sound expansion of the currency, through a full use of our gold we can arrest the fall of prices and again find the road to recovery. I desire to read briefly from some of those who take this view.

Calling attention again to Professor Cassel—to whom I shall refer more than once—I desire to read a further paragraph from one of his lectures:

> We now know that the value of gold can be controlled by suitable regulation of the world's monetary demand for gold. This alters the whole relation between currency and gold. Our ultimate purpose is now to give our currency a fixed value in terms of commodities. We regulate the value of gold with a view to making it correspond to that fixed value of our currency. * * *
> The Federal reserve authorities therefore control not only the general level of prices in the United States, but also the price level of all other gold-standard countries in the world.

Mr. Sprague, one of the advisers of the Bank of England and formerly professor of economics at Harvard University, speaking at a luncheon of the English-Speaking Union held in London a short time ago, said, in speaking of the increasing quantity of the metallic medium of gold money:

> The central banks could do that—> if they were convinced that it was advisable. There is no obstacle in their way on the ground of insufficient gold.

That is, stabilization of prices—

I wish it understood that I am not to-day assailing the gold standard. I simply wish to offer some views as to whether the gold standard is doing the work that it ought to and can do.

In the Macmillan report—a report made a short time ago by Lord Macmillan, with whom were associated a number of distinguished experts—we find this statement:

> Thus our objective should be, so far as it lies within the power of this country to influence the international price level, first of all to raise prices a long way above the present level and then to maintain them at the level thus reached with as much stability as can be managed. * * *
> At the same time we see no great reason to doubt the feasibility of attaining the objective of a higher price level in due course, provided that the central banks of the leading creditor countries will work together with this end in view. No one would doubt the ability of a closed monetary system to bring about a rise of prices; in fact it is only too easy. Thus the chief ground of hesitation is the difficulty of securing adequate cooperation among central banks rather than any obstacle inherent in the nature of the problems. The subsequent maintenance of stability may prove more difficult, but experience alone will supply a confident answer.

The view of the committee being that with the gold which is now in possession or under control of the central banks it would be possible to raise the price level; and the opinion is expressed that after raising it, it would be possible to maintain it.

Governor Harrison, in speaking before the committee, expressed a similar view.

Mr. President, the great question is, Can the fall of prices be arrested? If not, there is nothing ahead but disaster.

Rome has been referred to quite often in this session; but if we go back and search for the real cause of the fall of Rome it was not so much the ambition of political leaders as the fall of commodity prices. Three great civilizations in recorded history have been threatened by a persistent fall of prices. Two of these were saved by the discovery of a new supply of the precious metals, gold and silver.

Professor Jenssen, speaking a few days ago, had this statement to make—he was a member, as you recall, of the gold committee of the League of Nations. He says that if the fall of prices can not be arrested, which he thinks may be done under proper control of the gold supply of the world—

> If the process continues, millions of people in this economically interlocked world must inevitably die of starvation, and it is indeed doubtful whether our present civilization can survive.

Mr. President, it is sometimes said that prices began to fall after the stock-market debacle of 1929. With the exception of two years, when the United States was exporting a large amount of gold to other countries, which resulted in building up the markets, prices have been falling since 1925; and that fall has taken place cotemporaneously and along with the maldistribution, or what I call the sterilization, of a large part of the gold of the world. If we can not arrest the fall of prices and stabilize prices, what is the result?

We have an example before us at this session: More taxes, thereby destroying the energy and the initiative of the people; more taxes, less purchasing power, and more unemployed; more bonds, thereby destroying the credit of the Government and of the people of the United States. It is a process which works to its own certain chaos. There is no way, it seems to me, by which we can relieve unemployment, by which we can relieve the burden of debt, other than that of stabilizing prices, of increasing the price of a commodity, and then stabilizing it at a reasonable price. That, as I shall undertake to show upon authorities far more competent, of course, than myself to discuss this question, may be accomplished and brought about through a proper use of the gold supply which we already have in our possession.

The course which has been pursued during this winter with reference to relief measures can not do other than put us in deeper distress unless those measures are accompanied by measures and policies which result in the stabilization of commodity prices. As I have said, some contend this deflation must run its course, that these prices will find their natural level. My opinion is that the end of this depression, unless we make a wise use of our large gold supply, making it the base of a sufficient currency, is chaos.

As I said a moment ago, I do not wish to be understood as arguing for paper money, or as arguing for fiat money, or as attacking the gold standard. I am of the opinion that the gold standard is sufficient, if properly utilized, to the end for which it should be utilized. When I say sufficient I mean if supported by a silver policy for the Orient, as I shall describe later.

Mr. President, in 1913 England was perhaps the richest country in the world. She was the center of the largest commercial transactions on the globe. She was the center of the largest trade carried on in the world. The moving, driving power behind the commercial supremacy and the trade and financial supremacy of England at that time was the Bank of England. The Bank of England had at that time a reserve of some $200,000,000 in gold. The banks of the United States and France and the people of these countries at the present time have in their control some $7,000,000,000 of gold. The people of the United States are now in possession of some $4,000,000,000. We have $3,800,000,000 more than the amount upon which England maintained her commercial and financial supremacy.

I desire to read a paragraph, in connection with that statement, from the survey of the City National Bank made a short time ago.

> It is something to ponder over, that the Bank of England, with gold reserves to-day less than $700,000,000, is clearing more international business and rendering more international aid to business than the banking and currency systems of the United States and France together, although the gold holdings of these two countries aggregate over $7,000,000,000. These figures afford a convincing demonstration that something other than a lack of gold in the world is responsible for the present disordered world situation.

It is due to the fact that those who are in a position to control the situation and direct the course of affairs are frightened. Conservatism has come to be a cover for timidity, for incompetency, for unwillingness to aid. We have the means, we have the solid financial base, we have the power, in our gold supply, to do vastly more than we have been willing to do up to this time. We can choose our course. We can either adopt the bold initiative which will save the gold standard and bring prosperity to our people, or we can hoard and hide, timidly float with the downward tide, cause millions more to lose their business, their homes, and their farms, and at last sacrifice the gold standard. Mr. President, this is war in which we are engaged, and our generals timidly hide the utensils and instruments of war. This gold must come out of hiding and do service to mankind or give way to another system.

Mr. President, both political parties in Chicago declared for an honest dollar. Everybody is in favor of an honest dollar. The thing for which the world is crying out is an honest dollar, a dollar which can be purchased by the same amount of commodities to-day as it could a year or two years ago, a dollar which is stable, which when nominated in a contract does not accentuate the value of that contract by the mere lapse of time. Yes; everybody is in favor of an honest dollar; and if the platform makers at Chicago had discovered the Ten Commandments, and, in the ecstasy of their new discovery, had indorsed the Ten Commandments, they would have been no more axiomatic in the field of morals than they were in the field of finance when they indorsed the honest dollar.

No sane man wants a dishonest dollar, but we do want enough honest dollars.

What is an honest dollar? I maintain that we have not at the present time an honest dollar. In other words, our dollar is not stable in its purchasing power, and until it becomes so, and is made so, there can be no certainty in business, there can be no reliance on the future in business affairs, there can be no contracting for the future, and, therefore, business remains sterilized. It is not the dishonest dollar we are asking for. It is the honest dollar. When these people speak of an honest dollar who are they thinking of, the man who holds the mortgage or the man who must pay it? We want an honest dollar, a dollar which is fair to the creditor and debtor alike.

Let me read a statement from Professor Kemmerer, one which I have read before, but which I think relevant at this time. No more earnest advocate of the gold standard is to be found anywhere than Professor Kemmerer. He said:

> There is probably no defect in the world's economic organization to-day more serious than the fact that we use as our unit of value not a thing with a fixed value but a fixed weight of gold with a widely varying value. In a little less than half a century here in the United States we have seen our yardstick of value, namely, the value of a gold dollar, exhibit the following gyrations: From 1879 to 1896 it rose 27 per cent; from 1896 to 1920 it fell 70 per cent; from 1920 to September, 1927, it rose 56 per cent. If, figuratively speaking, we say that the yardstick of value was 36 inches long in 1879, when the United States returned to the gold standard, then it was 46 inches long in 1896, 13.5 inches long in 1920, and is 21 inches long to-day.

Mr. President, those changes in value, the rise and fall thus indicated, are almost as great as those of potatoes or other commodities. We have in this country at the present time something like $207,000,000,000 of public and private indebtedness. That has been increased by virtue of the increase of the value of the dollar until as a matter of fact the indebtedness in the country to-day, measured in commodities with which we must buy the dollar, is something like $400,000,000,000.

There is no way by which the people of the United States can escape from this burden of debt except through bankruptcy and enforced repudiation, unless some relief is afforded through the increase of the prices of commodities and the stabilization of prices.

Refering to Cassel again: In a lecture at Oxford, London, on May 21, he declared emphatically that the present fall of prices was not due to economic causes, to overproduction, to machinery, but to our monetary system, placing the responsibility for the extraordinary fall of prices squarely upon the central banks of the world. The effect of his statement was that, owing to the scarcity of gold, it was within the power of the banks to manipulate its use and that they did so with the effect of bringing about our present deplorable condition of affairs. He said:

> Neither technical progress in reducing the cost of production nor an increase in volume of production could properly be held to be causes of a general fall in prices.

Again, he said:

> If the central banks follow a policy which must lead, say, to a violent increase in the value of gold, the behavior of such banks must be regarded as the cause of this movement, and the banks have to carry the whole responsibility for the consequences.

Coming from this high source, from this outstanding authority, this is a fearful indictment. The loss of fortunes, the ruined health, the misery, the poverty, which have been brought about in the last two and one-half years are here placed upon the central banks and our monetary conditions.

We are in the midst of plenty—goods to wear are molding on the shelves and food to eat is rotting undistributed—but there is distress and confusion and want and misery everywhere. This condition is due, first, to the action of individuals and private corporations abroad and at home, in disarranging, dislocating, and impoverishing our monetary system and our monetary supply. Second, it is due to the timidity, if not the subserviency, of governments in permitting these things to be done. We have now reached the danger point. This condition can not go on. Governments must either act or take the consequences of the people acting which means chaos and untold suffering. In an orderly city here in the East a few days ago mothers with hungry children took their baskets, marched down to the markets and the grocery stores, filled them with food and went their way and defied the authorities to act. When this spirit spreads we will realize then the awful price we are paying for this procrastination.

It is within the power of the great central banks and the banking institutions of the United States to go far in stabilizing prices.

Some nine millions of people are out of employment, farmers are leaving their homes, unable to secure means by which to harvest their crops, and the crops when harvested are practically of no value, and there can be no escape from chaos except that the governments bend their energies toward the staying of the fall of commodity prices.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the world to-day is upon a paper basis, and it is so by reason of the fact that the vast supply of gold in the world has been sterilized and is now hidden in vaults. Twenty-seven nations have affirmatively gone off the gold standard. The great virtue of the gold standard was that it furnished an international standard, a unit of exchange which all the nations of the world accepted. That has practically been destroyed. Twenty-seven nations have gone off the gold standard; nine more in practice have abandoned the gold standard. To-day there are only two great nations on the gold standard, France and the United States. These two nations can not keep the gold standard if they do not take steps to preserve it. People are not going to hunger and die, become bankrupts, and see even civilization threatened merely that they may know that the gold of the Nation rests in a sterilized condition in the vaults of the country. Gold is not our master; it is our servant.

The report of the gold committee of the League of Nations advises us that the gold standard in all probability can not be restored within the immediate future or within the near future. It states that before the gold standard can be restored it will be necessary to settle the reparations question, the disarmament question, the question of international tariffs, and such political questions. If those questions must be settled before the return of the gold standard as an international unit, it is far in the future when that will take place. So we must look in upon ourselves and determine for ourselves what we can do with the vast supply of gold which we have at our disposal.

If we are going to hold off and refuse to send gold abroad in any way so as to enable the nations of Europe to have the advantage of it in building up their markets and trade, then certainly we ought to use it as a basis for expanding our currency not simply into the millions but, in my opinion, into the billions.

We have a sufficient supply of gold in this country at this time, according to a statement made by a distinguished financier of New York, to justify safely and soundly the expansion of the currency, not simply into the millions, but, if need be, into the billions of dollars; and if we should do so, we would not be in any different position—that is, on a basis of money more unsound or less sound—than in 1929. It is not inflation, it is reflation; it is reestablishing the commodity prices according to the standard of 1926, or possibly of 1929.

Mr. President, the question arises, What caused the breakdown of the gold standard? The first great fact with reference to the breakdown of the gold standard as an international proposition was the fact that the nations to whom were due reparations and debts would not accept anything but gold in payment of reparations and debts. The nations of the world which owed those heavy debts were not permitted to pay in goods; high tariff walls prevented the transfer of goods, and therefore they were compelled to pay in gold.

The result was that the gold shifted from the other nations to one or two nations to whom almost exclusively these debts were payable. The consequence was that the United States and France secured the vast supply of the gold of the world. In that way the other nations were deprived of the means of carrying on and carrying forward their commercial and trade affairs.

Secondly, Mr. President, after the maldistribution began to appear and the United States and France came to possess the larger portion of the gold, the other nations of the world began to hoard, and to-day, as a result, France and the United States monopolize the large gold supply of the world; and that which they do not actually control is now in hiding, or is hoarded in the vaults of the world. The world is to-day doing business upon a very small supply of gold, because a vast portion of it has been sterilized or hidden away in the vaults of the world.

I called attention a few moments ago to the fact that Great Britain had at the height of her commercial power a gold reserve of $200,000,000. We now have a gold supply of something like $4,000,000,000. In my opinion, as was said by a New York financier a few days ago in the press, that is a sufficient basis to give us ample, sufficient, and efficient currency upon a perfectly sound foundation.

If we are willing to use the gold which we have as the basis of our currency, a currency issued upon a gold base, we have an ample supply to bring about that fact. It is not for want of gold, it is not for want of a base, it is not for want of a sound foundation, but it is unwillingness upon the part of those who would be able to do so to utilize the gold to its full extent and its full power.

Secondly, Mr. President, aside from the question of expanding our currency in accordance with our capacity, I feel that we ought to call an international monetary conference, and that that should not be delayed until after election. I think the situation is so serious, so imminent, that any step that is possible to be taken should be taken now rather than a few months later. It is said that one of the great battles of the world, a battle upon which turned the history of the world, was lost because a portion of the troops came up 30 minutes late. I do not know how long, and no one knows how long the present situation can continue or how much deeper and more serious it may become before real chaos ensues; but certainly in view of the conditions which prevail in this country and throughout the world, if it is a sound thing to do to deal with monetary questions through an international conference, it may be too late to do it three or four months from now if we are to do it effectively. This conference should not only deal with the monetary questions generally, but it should restore silver to full use by nearly half the human family. But this question of the rehabilitation of silver is a question by itself. It does not properly come up upon this amendment. I shall discuss it on another occasion. It is a part of a plan, in my judgment, of preserving the gold standard. There is only about $11,000,000,000 of monetary gold in the world; the restoration of silver to nearly one-half the human family will strengthen the gold standard.

Mr. President, this is a situation and these are the conditions which confront us. The question is, What can be done and what shall we do in regard to the problem before us? We can continue along the course heretofore pursued or do nothing except in the way of temporary relief measures—and by continuing along that line we can invite general bankruptcy. Mortgages have been foreclosed or repudiated through lack of power to meet them, and in this way these debts may be wiped out. In other words, we can have a general program of bankruptcy and start in from there. This would mean ruined homes, ruined lives, unspeakable suffering, not to say anything of the possible consequences which sometimes follow in the wake of such a program. How long it would take to get through under this program no one can foretell. It would be a long time; and, in fact, for thousands and millions of people there would be no comeback whatever. They would lose all and thousands and millions of children would be undermined in health and handicapped for life.

I believe there is another road. I believe it is possible to stop deflation, to arrest the downward course, by increasing the price level. This can be done by increasing the amount of the monetary exchange or credit available for business. The supply of monetary exchange or credit has dropped to two-thirds of what it was three years ago. Can it not be brought back to what it was and will it not be a perfectly safe and sound thing to do?

Mr. President, I offer this amendment to the pending bill because I believe thoroughly in the principle which the amendment incorporates. I believe thoroughly in the policy which it announces. I do say that I think it is only a step in the right direction. We will have to go much farther before we have met the situation, but it is certainly a sound, sure advance in the right course. I trust that instead of dealing with the question of beer or intoxicating liquors we may at least take the first step in an effort to enable those who have homes to preserve them and to hold them, those who have farms to keep them, and possibly those who are out of employment to find employment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question before he sits down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator give us his estimate as to how much of an increase in the circulating medium would take place under the pending amendment?

Mr. BORAH. My understanding is that it would be something like $1,000,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. How will that come about?

Mr. BORAH. The banks which have the bonds may have the currency as provided by law, but they are limited by their capital.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is a limitation in the law on the amount of notes that any bank may have issued. That limitation is the equivalent of its per capita stock, so the true amount that may be issued is the aggregate of the capital stock of the banks, assuming that they all avail themselves of the provision.

Mr. BINGHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize that; but what I am trying to find out, if there is any way to estimate it with any accuracy, is how much of an increase this will bring about in the circulating medium.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me to answer that question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. REED. I think I can answer the Senator's question. The present capital of the national banks of the United States is $1,621,000,000. Their present outstanding circulation is $627,000,000. Consequently, if every bank utilized the power that it has under the present law to issue circulating notes up to the full amount of its paid-up capital stock, which is the limit under the law, there would be an increase of $994,000,000 under the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. GLASS. That is correct; and I shall put into the RECORD in a little while, when I am permitted to do so——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut has been recognized.

Mr. GLASS. Very well.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I want to congratulate the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate, on his success in drawing a red herring across the trail of the matter we have been discussing here, the amendment which was offered last night and the amended form of which was offered this morning.

In the first place he objects very strenuously to my putting as a rider on the bill something that has nothing to do with it directly. In the next place he immediately invites the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to offer as a substitute amendment to my rider something which has nothing whatever to do with the bill or my modifying amendment. Of course, it is perfectly evident what is the object of this clever move on the part of Democrats who desire to avoid a vote on a matter which their platform says requires "immediate" attention.

I do not desire to refer unnecessarily to the Democratic platform, but in view of this extraordinary procedure, in view of the effort to confuse the issue and prevent any kind of a vote, even a vote to send to the committee an amendment pending before the Senate on the subject of the modification of the Volstead Act, let me call attention to the fact that in the Democratic platform the words "immediate" or "immediately" occur only three times. The first time it occurs, the platform says:

> We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of Government expenditures.

That we are trying to take care of. That we shall be glad to cooperate in doing. That has already been done to a certain extent, but not to the extent which I hope to see it done. That is the first time the word "immediate" occurs.

Then we come to a large number of paragraphs advocating one thing and another. The Senator from Idaho referred to the fact that there was mention of an "honest dollar." I do not find those words here. I find this:

> We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards.

But after advocating one thing and another, paragraph after paragraph, we come toward the end of the platform, and then we find the word "immediate" again:

> We demand that the Congress immediately propose a constitutional amendment to truly representative conventions in the States called solely on that proposal—

Namely, repeal of the eighteenth amendment. We have on the table a resolution calling for this repeal which we hope to call up before the end of the session, and we hope the Democrats will see fit to carry out that part of the platform recently adopted by their party by helping those of us who desire to secure immediate repeal to get that resolution up and have it considered.

Then occurs the word "immediate" for the third and last time in the Democratic platform, where it says:

> Pending repeal, we favor immediate modification of the Volstead Act to legalize the manufacture and sale of beer and other beverages of such alcoholic content as is permissible under the Constitution and provide therefrom a proper and needed revenue.

When the Democratic convention adopted that plank with great enthusiasm, something called by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] akin to frenzy, the sentiments of those voting it were reechoed throughout the United States by those who believe that one of the causes of the present depression is the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, and that one of the ways whereby we can create employment and balance the Budget and improve the price of commodities is by repealing the eighteenth amendment as soon as possible and in the meantime modifying the Volstead Act in so far as it may be modified under the Constitution.

Mr. President, I had offered an amendment calling for 4 per cent rather than one-half of 1 per cent alcoholic content as provided in the national prohibition act. I gathered from statements made yesterday by representatives of the Democratic Party who attended the Chicago convention that they feel that 4 per cent would be possibly unconstitutional. One of the members of the convention in Chicago, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], insisted that the reason why they had pending an amendment calling for 2.75 per cent beer instead of 4 per cent beer was because they wished to bring it within the constitutional limitations. This amendment, Senators will remember, was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who was a member of the platform committee of the Democratic Party at Chicago, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], all of them members of that convention. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], speaking for them in reply to a question of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], said, "We want to try to bring it within constitutional limitations." In other words, the Members of the Senate of the Democratic Party who were in the convention which adopted this plank calling for immediate modification believe that by a 2.75 per cent provision the matter can be brought within constitutional limitations.

Very well, Mr. President. My object in bringing the matter up at this time is to endeavor to secure a change in the economic situation, to endeavor to promote employment, to endeavor to provide additional revenue for the Government. I had thought when the Democratic convention with such a blare of trumpets came out for immediate modification of the Volstead Act and in favor of beer, it did not mean "nearer beer," as the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] referred to it, or 2.75 per cent beer; but it meant real beer of the kind formerly produced and at present produced in Germany, where Pilsner has a percentage of 3.2 by weight, or the beer formerly produced in St. Louis by the breweries of the Anheuser-Busch Co., which was 4 per cent by volume and 3.2 per cent by weight. But apparently the Democratic convention, or those who fixed the platform, were only interested in "nearer beer," something better than one-half of 1 per cent, and something that still could be had under the Constitution. Therefore, in order to secure their support for a carefully considered movement to secure the immediate modification of the Volstead Act, I changed my proposal to 3.45 per cent by volume. The reason why I did not change it to 2.75 per cent by weight, of which it is the equivalent, was that in the Volstead Act itself, wherever the percentage of alcohol occurs, it is by volume. The Volstead Act provides that the penalties of the law shall apply to any beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume; anything containing one-half of 1 per cent by volume, such as buttermilk or old-fashioned ginger ale or old-fashioned ginger beer, or any such harmless drinks which contain one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, and sometimes a little more. So I have made my amendment conform to the requirement of the Volstead Act by using the word "volume" rather than the word "weight."

May I say to Senators who are willing to vote for the legalization of beer with an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent by weight, which, according to the statement of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] brings it within constitutional limitations, that the amendment which I have offered legalizing beer with an alcoholic content of 3.45 per cent by volume is exactly within the same constitutional limitations, for 3.45 per cent by volume is equivalent to 2.75 per cent by weight?

I changed my amendment because it was stated on the other side of the aisle that it was felt that a percentage of 2.75 by weight or 3.45 by volume was within the Constitution, and that many Senators could not vote for anything they thought unconstitutional. I also changed it because of the receipt of a telegram from Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor and president of Labor's National Committee for Modification of the Volstead Act, which I received late yesterday afternoon, and in which he says:

> On behalf of Labor's National Committee for Modification of the Volstead Act, we sincerely hope that all Members of the Senate and House who recognize need for immediate change in present conditions will join in supporting the bills modifying present Volstead Act. We sincerely hope forces favoring modification of Volstead Act will not become divided to the point of permitting defeat because of difference as to alcoholic content. We trust you will leave no stone unturned to secure immediate modification of Volstead Act, especially in view of both political party's conventions having expressed dissatisfaction with present prohibition situation.

In accordance with that request, Mr. President, in order that there might be no doubt in anyone's mind as to the constitutionality of the proposal, in view of the plank in the Democratic platform declaring that the Democratic Party is for immediate repeal of the Volstead Act, and in order to secure the manufacture and sale of beer—and that means beer by weight of alcohol of 2.75 per cent or 3.45 per cent by volume—I have changed the amendment in the hope that I might secure Democratic support. There has always hitherto been more support on this side of the aisle for my beer proposal than on the other side of the aisle, and I hoped I might secure their support. But now see what has happened. The leader of the Democratic Party on the other side of the aisle announces that he is about to move to refer this amendment to the Judiciary Committee.

Notwithstanding the fact that the bill from which the amendment was taken was sent to the Committee on Manufactures last December; notwithstanding the fact that that committee held prolonged hearings upon it, which are published in the volume which I hold in my hand embracing nearly 600 pages; notwithstanding that both wets and drys were heard at length on this matter; notwithstanding the fact that the Committee on Manufactures gave close and careful consideration to it over a period of several months, and that the subcommittee having this matter in charge recommended its adoption, though, to be sure, the full committee by a vote, if my recollection serves me aright, of 6 to 4 voted against it; and notwithstanding the fact that it has been on the calendar for the last two months with a majority report against it and a minority report for it—notwithstanding all these facts, the Senator from Arkansas proposes, if he can not cloud the issue in some other way by securing the adoption of some other amendment not related to it in the slightest degree, to send it to the Judiciary Committee, a committee, forsooth, that has shown its inability to handle matters of this kind by keeping safely pigeonholed in the committee since the first of last December a considerable number of bills proposing to modify the Volstead Act and to repeal the eighteenth amendment. Of course, there is only one object in any such motion, and that is that there may be no immediate consideration of this proposal. It is quite evident that there is no desire on the part of the Democratic Party as represented here to secure the immediate modification of the Volstead Act, notwithstanding the fact that the word "immediate" which occurs in their platform only three times, appears twice in connection with this subject.

Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Idaho would withdraw his substitute amendment and permit us to vote straight and to come clean on this issue. I realize that not many weeks ago I pleaded with another body "to come clean" on this issue and was voted down in my effort to have it "come clean" on this one issue and to give the people a chance to vote on it. I pleaded with the Senator from Idaho not to refuse me this privilege, as it was refused me in the Republican convention at Chicago, but to permit us to vote on this question.

When the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] introduced an amendment regarding farm relief at the time when I expected to offer this amendment, I did not endeavor to cloud the issue which he presented; I did not offer my amendment as a substitute for his. I might have done so, and, had I done so, then no further amendment to it would have been in order, as then it would have been an amendment in the third degree; but I permitted him to have a vote on his amendment as a clean issue, and the vote was so taken. So I ask the Senator from Idaho if he will not withhold his amendment and permit us to vote on it after we have settled the question as to whether or not the Volstead Act shall be immediately modified?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is as long as it is short; if the Senate does not want to adopt my amendment, it can vote it down.

Mr. BINGHAM. It can do that perfectly well if the Senator will offer it as a separate amendment just as the Senator from North Dakota offered his.

Mr. BORAH. I think I will adhere to my course.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator has shown himself an able aid to those Members of the Democratic Party on the other side of the aisle who are known as "drys" and who desire nothing to be done at the present time in the way of a vote on this amendment. That is quite obvious.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. REED. Assuming the effort of the Senator from Idaho to be successful and his substitute to be accepted by the Senate, what is there to prevent the Senator from Connecticut from again offering his proposal as an amendment to the bill which is the unfinished business?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Am I correct in understanding that if the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho as a substitute for my amendment should be adopted by the Senate, a subsequent offering of the same amendment as the one I offered this morning would be out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that it would be out of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. That answers the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I may make the inquiry, what is to prevent the Senator from Connecticut from offering his proposition to the Senate as an independent proposition and not as an amendment to any bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. I stated yesterday in answer to a similar question that I would be delighted to do so if the Senator from Virginia or anyone else could assure me that there would then be a vote in the House of Representatives upon it and that it would go to the President and become a law; but the leaders of the House of Representatives have stated in the public press that if one of the beer bills before the Senate in amended form should go to the House, it would be sent to a committee and there would be no vote upon it at this session, and there would be no immediate modification.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator knows perfectly well that no Senator here can give him any assurance as to what the other House will do.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the leaders of the House have stated that there was no chance of a vote upon it.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator did present his proposition on one occasion and did not get any more help on his side of the aisle than he got on this side. Why does he want to make a petty political question of it? Why not consider it upon its merits?

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to consider it upon its merits.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator is now, instead of in November, running for the Senate from Connecticut here on the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to consider it on its merits and not on the merits of the bill offered by the distinguished Senator from Virginia, which has been on the calendar for a long time. What I object to is having that bill offered as a substitute for my amendment. I have not offered my amendment as a substitute for the home loan bank bill or as a substitute for anything offered by the Senator from Virginia, but as an amendment on which we may vote to the bill itself. I know the Senator from Virginia will vote against it; he has said so, and so will many other Senators, but why not let us have a vote on that proposition, instead of clouding the issue by bringing up the bill of the Senator from Virginia as a substitute for it when it has nothing whatever to do with it?

Mr. GLASS. The bill of the Senator from Connecticut has nothing whatever to do with the home loan bank bill now before the Senate—not a thing on earth. It has not one semblance of germaneness while my bill has.

Mr. BINGHAM. Ah, Mr. President, the bill offered by the Senator from Virginia has no semblance of germaneness to the amendment for which it is offered as a substitute. That is the complaint I am making. It has not the slightest semblance of germaneness, but the trouble is that the members of the Democratic Party on the other side of the aisle do not wish to vote at this time on the modification of the Volstead Act. They do not even want to take the chance of voting to send it to the committee for fear that such action will be interpreted as dodging the issue and not allowing the question to come up, although the measure was considered by a committee of the Senate for months and has been on the calendar for the last two months, and, consequently, they think they are going to fool the country by going to them on a platform calling for the immediate modification of the Volstead Act and the legalization of beer and getting the votes of the wet States that want beer.

Notwithstanding all the disparaging remarks which have been made about it by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Idaho, it is a subject in which many people are deeply and seriously interested and which they profoundly believe in as the one thing that will to-day change the economic situation in this country. Yet the Democrats want to go before the country on a platform favoring the immediate modification of the Volstead Act to provide for the manufacture and sale of beer, but will not take the opportunity they now have to vote for its immediate modification.

Mr. GLASS. The modification of it within constitutional limit; but the Senator from Connecticut was not even able to convince the committee dealing with the question that his proposition was within constitutional limitations. The Senator does not know any more about what is a constitutional limitation than I do, and I know absolutely nothing about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I entirely agree with the Senator as to the latter part of his statement. I have suggested the particular proportion of alcohol provided in the amendment on the basis of the action of the distinguished Senator from Maryland, who, with the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Ohio, had offered a proposal which they said they believed to be within constitutional limitations. So I am not standing alone in this matter.

Mr. GLASS. No; but almost alone. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, Mr. President, if that be true then the country had better know it, and the quickest way for the country to know it is to have them realize that the Democratic Party, having adopted as one of its planks the immediate modification of the Volstead Act, will smother that proposition with another proposition offered by the Senator from Virginia which has nothing whatsoever to do with it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I suggest to the eminent Senator from Connecticut that there is a consideration which I fear has been overlooked and I interrogate him upon this idea. He has constantly alluded to the platform, referring to the platform of the Democratic Party, although the platform of his party has spoken on the same subject. Is it his conclusion that the object he seeks to reach is to be predicated upon the matter of platform declarations? If so, I remind the able Senator that the platform of a party does not have any declaration of any authority until that party has gone to the people to whom it has made the declaration and received from the people the approval of the theory promulgated. Then, if the people indorse that theory, they license at the election their Senators and Congressmen immediately to put it into effect; but before such license is given and before the approval of the platform declaration upon which they go to the people for election there are no commissions granted for action, but it is a question for determination by each Senator individually in accordance with his own personal convictions.

Mr. BINGHAM. In other words, a political platform is something like the platform of a railroad coach—something to get in on but not to ride on. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. I would advise the Senator that the statute of antiquity has run against that ancient epigram.

Mr. BINGHAM. As long as we can know just where we stand, we can know how to go forward.

I have found, in the votes that have been taken, that there were more Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle than on the other who were willing to take a forward step in the direction in which I am interested. I had supposed that with the adoption of the Democratic platform we might get a very great measure of assistance from the other side of the aisle; but it is quite obvious that that is a hope that will not bear fruition, particularly in view of this amazing spectacle of dodging the issue by beclouding it with a bill that has been on the calendar for months, favored by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], which has nothing whatever to do with the amendment to which it is offered as a specious form of substitute.

Mr. President, it has been maintained that there is something very wicked about beer and "red liquor," as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] so tastefully refers to it. "Red liquor" and beer are something with which we must not have anything to do. That was the position taken when the eighteenth amendment was adopted. It was adopted in the hope that as an experiment, similar to other experiments in which this country had indulged for more than a century in an effort to stamp out intoxication and intemperance, it might succeed. I am proud to say that the State from which I come—and the little State next to it—regarding the eighteenth amendment as an infringement on State rights, refused to indorse that amendment, refused to ratify it; and it is still their proud record that they were not swept away at that time by any specious reasons leading anyone to believe that the adoption of the eighteenth amendment would promote temperance; and their belief has been carried out.

Now we have the spectacle of both great political parties admitting that the eighteenth amendment has been a mistake, and that it should be amended or repealed, and that promptly. We have the spectacle of the great mass of people in this country believing that the eighteenth amendment has been the cause not only of economic depression, not only of a deficit to the Government, but also of much social unrest and of great increase in drunkenness on the part of young people.

It is indeed a sad thing to look at the records of our courts connected with drunkenness during the past few years and to see how during the past 10 years arrests for intoxication have steadily increased, notwithstanding the steadily increasing number of those who were hired to put the Volstead Act into effect. We find not only that the total number of arrests for intoxication is greater to-day than it was before prohibition went into effect but that the number of young people arrested is enormously greater.

Last year, in the city of Cleveland, a municipal judge told the committee, in the hearings which I hold in my hand, that there were 32,000 arrests for intoxication, and he said the average age of those 32,000 persons was 25 years, and no one below 18 was arrested and brought into that court. So that 16,000 of those persons arrested for intoxication were between the ages of 18 and 25. In other words, not one of those young people was more than 10 or 12 years old when the Volstead Act was passed and when the eighteenth amendment was adopted, that were going to keep young people from ever knowing the taste of alcohol!

What a commentary it is on the frailties of human nature and on the unwisdom of legislative bodies that they adopted an amendment in the hope that it would keep young people from knowing the taste of alcohol and, as a result, more young people are arrested for intoxication to-day than ever before in the history of this Nation!

Mr. President, there has been a tendency on this floor to make fun of beer, to hold it up to ridicule, to assume that all that anyone could be interested in, in offering an amendment which would legalize the manufacture and sale of beer, was securing a pleasant hour, or something to drink, or getting "red liquor." Mr. President, that is an assertion which those of us who are devoting our time and attention to endeavoring to correct this situation resent. That is a statement which shows how little those who put it forward appreciate the actual situation.

Let me read a resolution adopted unanimously by the board of supervisors of the city of San Francisco. On March 21, 1932, they adopted the following resolution:

Resolution 113

Whereas there appeared in the San Francisco Examiner, Sunday, March 20, 1932 (Universal Service from Washington, D. C.), an article stating that the majority of subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures had reported favorably the bill introduced by Senator HIRAM BINGHAM, of Connecticut, which would restore the manufacture of 4 per cent beer, under Federal restrictions, to be sold in cases of pint bottles under regulations prescribed by the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury; and

Whereas the five main advantages are:

1. It will promote temperance, strengthen the law, decrease crime, and generally contribute to the public welfare.

2. It will give employment to between 500,000 and 1,000,000 persons within a reasonably short time.

3. It materially will assist agriculture by providing a rich market for the products of the farm.

4. It will give the Government an annual income of between $347,000,000 and $800,000,000, based on a tax of 2 cents for each pint bottle, and between $650,000,000 and $1,100,000,000 with a 4-cent tax.

5. It will drive many speakeasies, which breed contempt for law, out of existence by curbing the Nation's appetite for poisonous, habit-forming hard liquors; and

Whereas the taxpayers of San Francisco, represented by the board of supervisors, would be greatly benefited by relief of tax burden for the maintenance of the Federal Government; and

Whereas the restoration of nonintoxicant 4 per cent beer would provide immediate employment for great numbers of men and women in various industries and bring much-needed revenues into homes of people now unemployed: Therefore be it

Resolved, by the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco, That the Congress of the United States be respectfully and urgently requested to approve the passage of the Bingham, or a similar, bill, and the Senators from California and the Representatives in Congress from San Francisco be requested to do everything possible for the passage of this legislation; further

Resolved, That the San Francisco Examiner and its allied newspapers be commended for its educational efforts to bring about the modification of the stringent and nonenforceable Volstead Act so far as it prohibits the manufacture of nonintoxicant beer.

Adopted by the board of supervisors, March 21, 1932.

Ayes: Supervisors Breyer, Brown, Canepa, Colman, Gallagher, Havenner, Hayden, McSheehy, Miles, Peyser, Power, Roncovieri, Shannon, Spaulding—14.

Absent: Supervisor Stanton—1.

I hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was adopted by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco.

J. S. DUNNIGAN, Clerk.

Mr. President, that resolution calls vividly to mind the reason why this is an important matter. This is not merely a matter of satisfying the pleasant desires of those who put on the backs of their cars the cheering sign or the thirsty sign, "We want beer." It is not merely with the idea of satisfying those who are thirsty. It is with the serious belief; the most profound belief, that by modifying the Volstead Act at the present time up to the limit of our constitutional power to modify it—and I have already called attention to the fact that the Senators on the other side of the aisle have agreed that the Democratic convention believed that 2.75 per cent beer by weight, or 3.45 beer by volume, was entirely within the Constitution—it is with the belief that modifying the Volstead Act within the Constitution may bring about a return of industrial prosperity, may start the ball rolling in the right direction, may cause us to turn the corner as nothing else that has been suggested will do.

The bill now before us, the home loan bank bill, proposes to promote prosperity how? By loaning people money with which to buy homes and saddling upon them the burdens of debt; but it provides in no way for giving them the means to pay for the homes when they are borrowing the money with which to buy them.

It is said that this amendment of mine is not germane to the present bill. Mr. President, is it not germane to provide money to give people a chance to buy homes—not to borrow the money, but to earn the money?

In the first place it will give a market for their grain to 100,000 farmers who at present can find no market for their grain. They now raise an average of 1,000 bushels in the course of a year, and this will provide a market for 100,000,000 bushels of grain. Those 100,000 farmers, if they found a market for their grain, would be buying many things from the industrial States of the Union, and food products from the agricultural States if they needed to buy them. That would put money in circulation. That would promote industry. That would bring happiness to thousands of homes and the means of livelihood to tens of thousands of people.

Another thing: It will immediately put to work a large number of brewery workers. For example, I have in my hand an article taken from the New York World-Telegram of Wednesday, April 20, by George Daws, World-Telegram staff writer, which is headed:

RUPPERT READY TO HIRE 600 IN BREWERY AND SPEND $5,000,000 IF BEER RETURNS

"When Congress tells me I can make and sell good old-fashioned 4 per cent beer, I'll immediately hang out a sign, 'Wanted—600 to 1,000 men for permanent jobs,'" Jacob Ruppert, master brewman, said to-day.

"I'll buy 150 trucks and much other equipment. I'll start right away spending $5,000,000 for improvements—and that means thousands more jobs."

The very item of 150 trucks means putting hundreds of men to work making those trucks, furnishing a market for more trucks. The spending of $5,000,000 means what? It means the employment of carpenters, masons, bricklayers, tinsmiths, all kinds of artisans, in renewing the breweries all over this country. In New York City alone, in this one case, there is an offer to spend $5,000,000 for that purpose. If it were possible to modify the Volstead Act, breweries now closed all over this country would be reopened. Carpenters, masons, bricklayers, painters, artisans of every description could find jobs in renewing those breweries and putting their machinery into operation again. That will give money to them with which to help pay for their homes. All that this bill undertakes to do is to loan them the money; but it does not say where they are going to find any means of paying the interest on it, or of paying the principal. This amendment, however, gives them the means of earning some money.

In addition to the tens of thousands of men, perhaps hundreds of thousands, who would be employed in repairing and bringing back into condition the breweries, there are tens of thousands of brewery workers who would be gathered together and who would get jobs in this particular.

Mr. President, may I remind you that when the eighteenth amendment was adopted, the worthy temperance people in this country, the National Prohibition Committee, advertised in many papers that that measure was not simply a temperance measure; in fact, those were the very words used in the newspaper advertisements, that it was a war-time measure. It was to help win the war. It was because 300,000 men would be released from their jobs in connection with the manufacture of these beverages to go to work and help win the war, to go into the Army, and manufacture things needed in the war. If that was true at that time, if it was true that 300,000 men lost their jobs then, and had to find some other work to do, will it not be true to-day that if we reverse the process, 300,000 men can find those jobs again? Thus unemployment would be directly relieved to the extent of 300,000, and indirectly all through the industries connected with it. The bottle-making industry will require hundreds if not thousands of additional operatives, as will the stopper-manufacturing industry, the label-making industry, the printing industry, advertising in the newspapers, and all that will give employment to thousands of men. Is not that worth while? Will not that help us turn the corner of this depression? Has anyone in Congress suggested since the first of December last any measure that would put to work permanently more men, that would furnish a market for more grain, that would furnish a market for more coal, than this measure which we have offered here to-day, and which is scornfully turned aside by the Democratic Party, which evidently intends to hide behind the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho, which has nothing to do with it, a resolution which is clearly not germane to this at all?

It is claimed that my amendment is not germane to the bill in hand. I have shown that it would help build homes. But the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho in lieu of this amendment is not germane to it at all. It is merely offered in the hope that his motion may prevail, and that those timid souls who dare not follow their platform in this regard, and dare not show that they will not follow it, may, in sooth, vote for something else, and not be obliged to vote directly on the question before us.

My plea to the Senator from Idaho that he would permit a vote to come on this amendment first, and then give the Senate a chance to vote for his amendment, fell on deaf ears, naturally. The Senator from Idaho is not interested in repealing the eighteenth amendment or modifying the Volstead Act. He has stated on this floor that he would not even go as far as the plank in the Republican platform goes in that regard. Furthermore, he is not interested even in studying these matters. When placed on a subcommittee of the Committee of the Judiciary, charged with the duty of studying various measures offered to modify the Volstead Act and repeal the eighteenth amendment, which were referred to that subcommittee, did he give any time to the meetings of the subcommittee? Not so far as I have been able to discover. He was not present at any of the hearings they held, as far as I have been able to find, and when the chairman of that subcommittee called a meeting of the subcommittee to vote on these matters, to make a report to the full committee, called a meeting definitely for that purpose, who was present at that meeting? There was present the chairman, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], noted as a wet. There was present the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], also classed as a wet. The three drys were absent. They did not care to vote on any of these matters. They did not regard it as an important matter at all to report to the full committee their findings in regard to the modification of the Volstead Act or the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

No wonder, then, that one of the most distinguished members of that subcommittee now comes before us with a cloud of another sort to cover any action in regard to the proposed modification of the Volstead Act, when he himself did not take the trouble to go to the committee meeting; when his presence might have thereby caused a quorum to report to the full committee something in the nature of relief against the eighteenth amendment or the modification of the Volstead Act.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a very interesting letter from the State of Florida, dated in the senate chamber, Tallahassee, signed by William C. Hodges, senator from the eighth district of Florida. He has given me permission to read and to have reprinted this part of his letter:

I have been following with considerable interest your activities in favor of the modification of the present prohibition laws, and, while I neither indulge in the use of intoxicating liquors or in any way subscribe to the return of the open saloon, I feel the necessity of a reasonable modification of the existing prohibition laws:

1. That revenue may be produced.
2. That the expense incident to an unpopular and unenforceable law may be done away with.
3. That the opportunity for new employment may come.
4. That the sale of products may be increased which would go into the manufacture of liquors.
5. More than all, that the people may not be taught to disregard all laws because there is one law which they will not regard.

The idea seems prevalent that the people of the South, regardless of anything, will support the existing prohibition laws; I do not believe this to be true if the matter is properly placed before the people of the South.

The letter is dated February 23, 1932.

Mr. President, that letter was prophetic, because several months later many delegates to the Democratic National Convention from Southern States, including the delegates from Florida, voted for a plank favoring immediate repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the immediate modification of the Volstead Act. I can not help wondering, Mr. President, when they did that, when their action was received with so much applause, except by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and others who think as he does—I can not help wondering whether those who applauded and those who passed that plank suppose for a minute that the word "immediate" did not mean now, but meant at some distant time in the future, when a convenient day might arrive when we might consider this matter without being faced with an election in the near future.

Mr. President, there is another aspect of this question which makes it one of great seriousness, and not of levity, or any effort merely to give people that pleasure which they are supposed to derive from drinking beer or "red liquor." It is the question of revenue.

Great Britain has succeeded in balancing her budget. A very large percentage of the revenue with which she does it is derived from regulating and taxing the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages.

On our statute books to-day there is a law providing for a tax on beer of $6 a barrel. From the amendment which I have offered, and which the Senator from Idaho is not willing for us to get a direct vote on, there could be derived an income, it is believed, of about $350,000,000 to $375,000,000. That revenue we need. That revenue would help to relieve taxation.

In that connection, may I read another editorial from yesterday's Washington Daily News, which is very pertinent in this regard? It reads as follows:

WHILE YOU PAY AND PAY AND PAY

You, dear reader, have started paying 3 cents for a postage stamp. You are paying a tax on your tooth paste. You are feeling the pinch of the new nuisance taxes. And as the months pass these taxes will become no easier through frequent paying; they never do.

Every time you mail a letter, buy a tube of tooth paste, a box of candy, matches, lubricating oil, gasoline, or any one of a long list of things, these new taxes will become just that much more burdensome. Your patriotic desire to help balance the Budget will not eliminate the annoyance of these nuisances.

Taxes, of course, must be levied and collected. The Government could not operate otherwise. Yet there are easier, pleasanter taxes, and the way is mapped out to levy and collect them.

The Democratic convention by overwhelming vote declared for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and for immediate modification of the Volstead Act to legalize and tax beer.

The Republicans declared for doing something or other about prohibition and by November will be claiming, undoubtedly, that they are as keen about repeal as the Democrats.

Yet neither Republican nor Democratic Congressmen will be sincere or convincing then if they fail to vote to modify the Volstead Act now.

Congress can raise as much as $375,000,000 in Federal revenue through a tax on beer. That sum exceeds all that will be raised by the petty nuisance taxes.

Think of this as you enjoy the luxury of licking a 3-cent stamp. Keep it in mind when the congressional campaign gets under way. And don't forget it when you enter the polling booth in November.

Mr. President, the question of revenue is of vital importance. The question of providing more revenue easily and immediately is of such vital importance that any one who can claim that this amendment is of trifling importance simply does not know what he is talking about, simply shows that he has not studied it, has not studied the question, has not consulted with the revenue authorities of the Government. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue testified before our committee that there would be no difficulty whatever in collecting this tax, and collecting it immediately, as soon as the manufacture and sale of beer were made legal.

I shall not take up much more time. I realize that the cards are stacked against me. I now realize painfully that the hopes I had, when I heard from Chicago that the Democratic Party had gone on record favoring the immediate modification of the Volstead Act so as to permit the manufacture of beer and its subsequent economic, fiscal, and social advantages, were unfounded. I had thought that at last we might have a large addition to the number of those who believed in this subject. As I have stated previously, the number on this side of the aisle has been formerly considerably larger than that on the other side of the aisle. I was unable to get the Republican Party to adopt a plank in the platform, which I desired in this regard, and must therefore put myself along with the Senator from Virginia in the attitude of not standing on that particular plank of my party. As he is unwilling to stand on the plank of his party in regard to the eighteenth amendment, so I am unwilling to stand on the plank of my party. But I did hope that most of the Senators on the other side of the aisle would stand by their party's declaration for immediate modification. I had no idea that they would resort to such a subterfuge, such a dodge, as this.

If they think the American people are going to be fooled by this action, then their opinion of the voters they are counting upon to bring them back into power next November is not as high as mine. I do not think anybody is going to be fooled by this. They are not even willing to go on record as sending it back to the committee. They are unwilling to have anything to do with it, so that anyone can say, "You voted indirectly against this, by sending it back to the committee, when it had been considered in committee for months." For nearly half a year it has been before us.

No, Mr. President; they have cooked up an extremely clever scheme, but it fools nobody; it will fool nobody at the polls. When the Democratic platform says "immediately" it means some time in the future; it does not mean now.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALCOTT in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Dale	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Dickinson	Kean	Schall
Bingham	Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Black	Fess	Keyes	Shipstead
Blaine	Fletcher	King	Shortridge
Borah	Frazier	La Follette	Smoot
Bratton	George	Lewis	Steiwer
Brookhart	Glass	Long	Stephens
Broussard	Glenn	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Bulkley	Goldsborough	McKellar	Townsend
Bulow	Gore	McNary	Trammell
Byrnes	Hale	Metcalf	Tydings

Cohen	Hatfield	Norbeck	Walcott
Connally	Hawes	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Hayden	Nye	Watson
Copeland	Hebert	Patterson	White
Costigan	Howell	Pittman

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted as offered by the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], who is now presiding, to strike out section 25 of the pending home loan bank bill and substitute new language therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the parliamentary situation into which we have now maneuvered ourselves is unfortunate. As is known by those Senators who have been here through to-day's session, the pending question was an amendment offered by the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to permit the sale of 4 per cent beer. Then to that has been offered as a substitute an amendment dealing with the circulating notes of national banks offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. So that, as we can readily see, the amendment of the Senator from Idaho will be voted on not only according to its own merits but will also in all likelihood be voted for by those Senators who want to put an end to the 4 per cent beer proposal. We have in this way inextricably mixed the questions of beer and currency expansion so that the coming vote will necessarily be misleading.

I hope, therefore, that when we come to the vote upon the amendment as amended we will get the true sentiment of the Senate upon the currency-inflation proposal, assuming, of course, that the substitute is adopted, and one would rather naturally expect it to be adopted, because of the fact that it will have the support of those who oppose the beer bill and all those who would like to see the currency expanded. However, on the second vote on the adoption of the amendment as amended I trust we will get the reflection of the real sentiment of the Senate upon the currency proposal. It is to that question that I propose to speak with as much brevity as I am capable of. I think we ought to understand exactly what is proposed to be done to the currency by the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho. In order to understand that proposal, we must understand the present condition of the issuance of circulating notes by national banking associations.

The present law is that national banking associations, upon depositing with the Treasurer of the United States bonds of any one of three issues, may issue circulating notes against those bonds up to the amount of the paid-in capital of the issuing bank; that is to say, any national banking association may deposit with the Treasurer of the United States bonds of the issue known as the consols of 1930, or bonds of the Panama Canal loan of 1916–1936, or bonds of the Panama Canal loan of 1918–1938. Those three bonds are known as bonds which carry the circulation privilege. The total amount of them is approximately $674,000,000. National banks have bought those bonds and have deposited them with the Treasurer of the United States up to the amount of $670,000,000; that is to say, all of the bonds of those three issues except about $4,000,000 worth have been bought by national banks, have been deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, and have been used or may be used as the basis for the issuance of circulating notes of the national banks.

Now, against that $670,000,000 of bonds there are now outstanding circulating notes of the national banks amounting to $627,000,000. Therefore, there remains $43,000,000 of national bank circulation which can be issued against these deposited bonds, but which in fact is not issued. The circulation of $627,000,000 is $43,000,000 less than the permissible issuance against these deposited bonds.

The limitation upon each bank to the amount of its stock is imposed by an act originally passed March 14, 1900, and subsequently reenacted October 5, 1917, which contains this proviso:

And provided further, That the total amount of such notes issued to any such association—

That is, by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing—may equal at any time, but shall not exceed, the amount at such time of its capital stock actually paid in.

It is important, Mr. President, in considering the pending proposal that we remember the language of that proviso, which has been the law since 1900, because instead of the amount of the currency issued by the national banks being limited by the amount of bonds that are available, it will be limited, if the proposal is adopted, not by the bonds, but by the paid-in capital of the national banks of the country.

At present the paid-in capital very much exceeds the aggregate of bonds that have the circulation privilege; consequently it is the latter factor that operates as the limiting factor of the national-bank notes issued. If the pending proposal is adopted, the amount of bonds eligible for the circulation privilege will very greatly exceed the paid-in capital, so that then it will be this clause in the old law of 1900 which will be the limiting factor, and the amount of circulation would be limited by the total paid-in capital of the national banks.

Now, what is the present proposal? It is to give the circulation privilege to all of the Liberty bonds of the United States, and it is further to give that privilege to all of the Treasury bonds of the United States. It would not give the privilege to United States certificates of indebtedness or Treasury bills or Treasury notes, but it would give it to all of the Liberties and to all of the Treasury bonds. On the last day of last month they aggregated approximately $13,460,000,000, consisting of $535,000,000 of 4¼ first Liberties, a very large amount of 3½ per cent of first Liberties, $6,268,000,000 of fourth Liberties bearing 4¼ per cent interest, and $758,000,000 of Treasury 4¼'s. I mention the high-interest bonds and ignore the lower-interest bonds, some of them bearing as low as 3 per cent, because obviously a national bank will buy bonds of the highest interest yield and issue its currency against them. So we see immediately that there is something over $8,000,000,000 or $9,000,000,000 of 4¼ per cent bonds that would be given the circulation privilege by the amendment.

At the present time the national banks of the United States have an aggregate capital of $1,621,000,000, so it will be seen that the immediate result of the amendment would be to authorize an increase in the circulation from the present $627,000,000 to $1,621,000,000, or a net increase of $994,000,000 in the circulating medium of the country.

In addition to that, so great are the advantages afforded by the Treasury to issuing banks that it is unquestionable that a great many State banks would be converted into national banking associations; it is unquestionable that new national banks would be organized in considerable numbers. I do not think, therefore, that the increase of $994,000,000 which I have mentioned would by any means be the limit of the amount of new circulation that would result from this proposal.

Let us test that by viewing the proposition from the standpoint of any bank. The officers of a bank know that by buying 4¼ per cent bonds—and such bonds at the present market can be had at a very slight premium over their face value—and issuing circulation against them, the bank is practically borrowing money at no interest whatever and obtaining an investment that will yield 4¼ per cent; that is to say, on an expenditure of nothing the bank secures a 4¼ per cent investment equal to the total of its paid-in capital. No bank can resist that temptation; every bank will issue circulation up to the maximum amount that is permitted to it. The temptation will be so great that it is only reasonable to expect that every bank that can do so will take advantage of it. I do not object to helping the banks.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If every bank that could do so were to take advantage of it, how much would the circulation be increased?

Mr. REED. If all the existing national banks were to take advantage of the privilege, the circulation would be increased $994,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. REED. How much it would be increased because of the organization of new banks or the transfer from State charters to national charters may only be guessed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think the Senator need be alarmed about that. Even if there should be a quickening in the increase of the number of national-bank charters, it would not be of very great consequence in connection with the total increase in circulation.

Mr. REED. Frankly I do not know, but I merely mentioned it because I did not want the Senate to think that the $994,000,000 which I have mentioned was the absolute limit.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has not any fear if the circulation should be increased in this very sound way by a billion dollars that it would work any detriment to the country, has he?

Mr. REED. Yes; I think there are certain unfavorable factors in it, and I am going to point them out. Furthermore, I do not think it would do the slightest good. I think I have presented the situation, Mr. President, in showing——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I recall that a few days ago the Senator from Pennsylvania when a request was made for the consideration of this bill objected on the ground that the bill, if enacted, would increase the circulation by $14,000,000,000. Then I pointed out to him that the maximum increase possible under present conditions would be about a billion dollars, but the Senator insisted that the increase would amount to $14,000,000,000.

Mr. REED. It would give the circulation privilege, as I have tried to explain, to bonds having an aggregate face value of $13,460,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; but that is not the controlling factor. As the Senator will understand, the controlling factor is the aggregate capitalization of the national banking associations.

Mr. REED. Exactly; and I have just been pointing out that there will be organized many additional banking associations. I do not know, nor does the Senator from Arkansas, how many, but by however so much capital as those new national banks may have just by so much may we expect the circulation to be increased.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Practically no charters are being granted now.

Mr. REED. Of course not, because this bill has not been passed, but its passage will very greatly stimulate the organization of national banks.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then does the Senator think, in view of the fact that there is no functioning now of the banks, either State or national, it would be helpful to have chartered a few new banks with new capital?

Mr. REED. Yes; a few, certainly, if there is any need for them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then the conclusion is that if the passage of this bill should result in the creation of new banks it would be advantageous to the public?

Mr. REED. To a certain extent, if there should be a need for new banks.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Why would the banks be likely to take advantage of this privilege any more than they now do in view of the open-market transactions of the Federal Reserve Board, in which they buy Government securities and issue certificates? The theory has been that that would increase the amount of circulation. As a matter of fact, the banks have not used that money, but they have taken up their credits with the Federal reserve banks and paid their correspondent banks. They have not put more money in circulation.

Mr. REED. I am coming to the relationship of the Federal reserve system to this proposal. At the present time we have more currency than we need. It is not that there is an inadequacy of our currency supply; that is not what is the matter with prices. We are not now going to increase the price of any commodity by one single red penny by issuing new circulation unless it is a debased circulation. Of course, if we go off the gold standard we can increase prices just in proportion to the volume of fiat money which we pour out; but if we are to remain upon the gold standard—and I know that a vast majority of us believe that we are to do so—then no amount of new sound currency we may issue is going to result in any increase in the price of commodities.

The Senator from New York has asked me why will a bank take advantage of this measure. I tried to explain that point when I invited him to put himself in the place of a board of directors of a national bank that found that it could secure a 4½ per cent investment free of any tax—because in the hands of a corporation these bonds are free of tax—by the expenditure of not one penny of their present assets, but by the expenditure of new money issued on the face of the bonds which they buy. Perhaps I should qualify that statement somewhat. They are required to keep, with the Treasurer of the United States, in lawful money 5 per cent of the face value of the note issue, so they will get 4¼ per cent on 95 per cent of their note issue. That is about what it boils down to.

At present, under the 2 per cent circulation privilege—that is, the privilege of issuing notes against 2 per cent consols—the banks have taken advantage of it to the extent of issuing $627,000,000 of currency against a permissible aggregate of $670,000,000. If they take advantage of it so generally against the 2 per cent bonds, it is self-evident that they will resort to it to the full in the case of the 4¼'s. So we would have an additional amount, say, of $1,000,000,000 of currency.

I asked the Treasury Department what their opinion of this measure was, and they came back with this reply in a letter to me dated June 24:

> Under the operation of the Federal reserve system the volume of currency in circulation is determined by the currency needs of the country, which, in ordinary times, depend largely upon such factors as the volume of retail trade, pay rolls, and so on. The currency facilities of the Federal reserve system are entirely adequate to the country's needs. Currency has been made available in volume sufficient not only to meet the demands of business but to meet the unusual currency demand which has been experienced during the past year and a half as the result of hoarding.
> At the present time there is about $5,505,000,000 of currency in circulation. The total is about $770,000,000 larger than a year ago, and about $1,080,000,000 larger than at the end of June, 1929. The Federal reserve banks are in a position to meet still further demands for additional currency, if necessary. Our interest at this time is not in the addition of more circulation to the amount already in circulation, but, rather, in the return flow of idle funds from hoarding back into active employment in the banking system.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator does the Treasury Department suggest how to bring about that return flow?

Mr. REED. They do not, but it seems to me that the answer is rather obvious, that we will have that return flow just so soon as the people of the country regain their confidence in the soundness of our banks.

Mr. BORAH. How long does the Senator think, under present conditions and tendencies, it will take to restore that confidence?

Mr. REED. I should think not very long if Congress does nothing foolish in regard to our financial situation.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose if Congress were abolished perhaps the situation would be better.

Mr. REED. I do not agree to that. I do not approve, any more than does the Senator, of the indiscriminate denunciation of Congress; but I do think that when the House of Representatives passes such bills as the Goldsborough bill, which was rejected by the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, I am proud to say, when it passes such bills as the Patman bonus bill, proposing the issuance of over $2,000,000,000 in greenback money, when it passes such measures as that, it frightens the people of this country and encourages hoarding.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator knows perfectly well that hoarding had been going on for months and months before the Goldsborough bill was passed, or before the bonus bill was passed.

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly that is true.

Mr. BORAH. Hoarding had been going on for 18 months——

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Long before the bills referred to ever came to the surface.

Mr. REED. Yes; but what started the hoarding was the failure of banks all over the country. That frightened people; the action of the House of Representatives last winter has frightened them still more, and the combination of the two is what is keeping money in hoarding at the present time.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator said that if the measure offered by the Senator from Idaho as an amendment to the pending bill should be adopted it would increase the circulation by $994,000,000.

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. WATSON. How much of that would go into circulation and how much would stay in the bank tills, where the money is at the present time?

Mr. REED. I do not think that any of it would go into circulation except as there arose a demand for it in legitimate business, and the demand of legitimate business to-day is not adequate to use the currency we have.

Mr. WATSON. In other words, when the Senator says that it would increase the circulation $994,000,000 he does not mean that to that extent it would increase the actual flow of money in the country?

Mr. REED. No; but, of course, when we speak of circulation we include not only money in people's pockets but money in the private banking institutions of the country.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. In view of the enormous amount of money per capita we already have in circulation, and yet the difficulty with which it flows back into business, what assurance have we, if we do this, that this additional money is going to flow into business without a restoration of confidence?

Mr. REED. I do not think we have any assurance at all that it will; but undoubtedly this will be availed of by the banks.

Now, let me paint again the picture of the board of directors of a single bank.

At the present time, under the Federal reserve system of which we are all justly proud, any bank that is a member of the system can get currency to meet legitimate needs by discounting with the Federal reserve bank of its district eligible paper, or by borrowing from that Federal reserve bank against United States bonds or notes or certificates. Any bank can get all the money that is legitimately needed in that way; but, if it does, it has to pay for the currency that it gets. It has to pay interest on the loan that it makes according to the prevailing rate established by that reserve bank. The charm of this scheme advanced by the Senator from Idaho is that the banks will get the money without paying any interest on the loan; for Tom, Dick, and Harry, who carry these bills in their pocketbooks, are going to get no interest, although they are actually lending that money to the national banks to enable them to buy these 4¼ per cent bonds.

Of course, the banks will resort to this privilege to the full, and it will render inactive that functioning of the Federal reserve system which at the present time allows the issuance of new currency as business demands it, but requires the payment of interest by the borrowing bank.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to say a few moments ago that this might lead to the incorporation of more national banks—to the transfer of banks from the State bank system to the national bank system.

Mr. REED. I think it would.

Mr. BORAH. And that the banks would avail themselves of this, because they could purchase the bonds practically without the payment of any interest.

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. BORAH. What would the banks do with that currency which they are so anxious to get?

Mr. REED. They would pay for the bonds with it, in effect.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean that they would simply purchase the bonds for the purpose of having the currency, and putting the currency in their vaults and leaving it there?

Mr. REED. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator think, then, that the currency would naturally be secured for the purpose of putting it in circulation and making something out of it?

Mr. REED. Not a bit of it. Here is the way it would work:

The Senator and I, as the board of directors of a national bank, would read that this bill had passed. We would then go into the market, and, if our bank had a capital of a million dollars, we would buy a million dollars of the cheapest 4¼ per cent bonds we could get. Those would be the 4¼ first Libertys, because they are soonest due. We would buy a million dollars of them, and we would deposit them here with the Treasurer of the United States, and he would give us national-bank notes to the amount of a million dollars. Fifty thousand dollars of that we would put in the Federal Treasury to furnish the reserve fund in lawful money. Nine hundred and fifty thousand dollars of it we would use in paying for the bonds that we had bought. We are not paying any interest rate on that million dollars that we have borrowed, in a sense, from the people of the country, and we are getting $42,500 totally tax free to us as interest on our deposited bonds.

It is a fine thing for the banks, but how it is going to help the people of the country any I can not see. It is going to be a bonanza for every national bank that gets that privilege.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. NORBECK. I want to say that the Banking and Currency Committee did not assume that the banks needed to buy the bonds. They assumed that they had them.

Mr. GLASS. Not a dollar would they buy. They have nearly five billions of bonds in their portfolios now. They would not have to buy a dollar—not a dollar.

Mr. NORBECK. And therefore the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho has force to it, that they will have additional currency to loan.

Mr. REED. Why, certainly. If they have already bought the bonds, then they will doubtless deposit bonds that they hold, and they will have this currency, and it will take the place of other borrowings, perhaps, from the Federal reserve bank of their district, or it will meet other withdrawal liabilities. I do not mean that these notes will not appear and be handed around; but they will take the place of other notes, and the aggregate amount of circulation in use in the trade of the country will not be increased by one iota.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. Referring to the illustration the Senator from Pennsylvania made a moment ago of a million-dollar bank which gets a net gain of $42,500 through this transaction, of course somebody pays it.

Mr. REED. To be sure.

Mr. GLENN. It is the taxpayers; is it not?

Mr. REED. Absolutely. Of course it is. Money does not come out of the air. Somebody is going to pay this very handsome profit that we are giving to the national banks.

Now, let us see some of the results of this proposal.

At the present time this supposititious bank of ours owns 2 per cent consols, and it already has its notes out against them. It is getting only 2 per cent interest on those consols of 1930. Of course, this bank of ours is not going to continue that. It is going to sell the 2 per cents and replace them with 4¼'s, either out of its own strong box or by buying them in the market. It is not going to be content with a tax-free income of $20,000 a year on this $1,000,000. It would rather have the $42,500. Immediately, we are going to see these bonds that now have the circulation privilege—the two issues of Panama Canal bonds, and the one issue of 2 per cent consols—sink down to the level which their 2 per cent coupon entitles them to rest on as investments. What that is, I do not venture to guess.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does not the Senator know that none of those bonds are held as an investment; that they are all held by banks solely because of their circulation privilege?

Mr. REED. Absolutely.

Mr. GLASS. And they could not be sold to anybody, now or hereafter.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; the Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. GLASS. Who would buy a 2 per cent bond now?

Mr. REED. I would buy it if I could buy it cheaply enough.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; if the Senator could buy it cheaply enough, but the only use of that 2 per cent bond is for circulation.

Mr. REED. Of course. That is what I am trying to say, and the only reason why the Panama Canal 2's, or the 2 per cent consols, sell at par to-day is because they have the circulation privilege.

Mr. GLASS. They will continue to have that.

Mr. REED. That is right; is it not? The only reason why they sell at par is because they have the circulation privilege?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and they will continue to have that.

Mr. REED. Oh, I beg the Senator to listen and then answer. I will state it a third time. The only reason why those 2 per cent bonds sell at par to-day is because they are unique among all our issues of Federal bonds, in that they carry this circulation privilege. Now, if we give a similar privilege to thirteen and a half billions of Liberty bonds and Treasury bonds, these 2 per cent bonds cease to have that peculiar value, and they sink at once to the point where they deserve to be considered only as investments, and, of course, they are going down in price. Would the Senator from Virginia hesitate one minute, in his own bank, to replace those 2's with Liberty 4¼'s.

Mr. GLASS. Certainly I would hesitate to do it. The 2's, for circulation privileges, are just as valuable as the 4¼'s.

Mr. REED. No, they are not; because——

Mr. GLASS. Why are they not?

Mr. REED. Because they carry only a 2 per cent coupon as against the 4¼ per cent coupon of the others.

Mr. GLASS. They can get from the Treasury here the same value of circulating notes.

Mr. REED. That is absolutely correct; but they do not get from the Treasury here the same amount in annual interest. So you have two bonds, one paying 2 per cent, the other paying 4¼ per cent and they are equally good for circulation privileges. Of course, you are going to get rid of the 2 per cent bonds and take the 4¼'s.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, you could not get rid of one of them to anybody but a bank; and the only reason why the bank would want it would be to make it a foundation for the circulation privilege.

Mr. REED. The Senator, of course, does not mean that quite as literally as he has stated it. The Senator could very easily sell a 2 per cent bond at 50 cents on the dollar, because that would make it a 4 per cent yield on cost. There is a price at which private investors will buy them.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, well, the Senator is dealing in improbabilities. I am dealing in facts.

Mr. REED. I hope it is improbable; but when you give these 4¼'s the same privilege that the present 2's have, they are going to sell on exactly the same interest basis just as sure as water finds its level. I think that is too obvious for argument, and it is not disposed of by the seraphic smile of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I am noted for my seraphic smile, and I can not help it. The Senator ought not to censure me for that, or taunt me, either.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. Surely.

Mr. NORRIS. While I am not agreeing with the Senator on what would happen to the 2 per cent bonds, for the purpose of my question I am assuming that the thing would happen that the Senator has stated. Suppose it does. If the bank sold its 2 per cent bonds to buy 4 per cent bonds, and all those bonds had sunk to the same level, depending on the rate of interest they bore, the amount the bank would lose on the sale of the 2 per cent bonds would just balance the amount it would gain on the purchase of the 4¼ per cent bonds.

Mr. REED. No; I wish that were so. It would be so if the amounts were equal, but there are eight or nine billion dollars of the 4¼'s outstanding, of which only about 10 per cent could be availed of for this purpose, and the amount is so great that they would probably continue to sell at about their investment value, whereas the 2's would immediately sink to their investment value.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does not the Senator know that under a provision of the existing Federal reserve act the 2 per cent bonds may now be exchanged for 3 per cent bonds at the rate of $25,000,000 a year?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. And is anybody going to sell his 2 per cent bonds at 50 cents on the dollar when he may exchange them for 3 per cent bonds?

Mr. REED. I did not say they were going to 50 cents on the dollar. I said they were going to the level fixed by their investment value. I have said that several times, and I hope I have made it clear to most of the Members of the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to withdraw the amendment which I offered this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is within the Senator's right, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am very happy that the Senator has seen fit to take that action, because now we are going to——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That carries with it the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho as a substitute.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course the Senator from Idaho can offer his amendment to the bill, and I suggest that he do that.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator want me to yield to him?

Mr. BORAH. No; not if the Senator desires to go ahead with his address, because I will offer the amendment as soon as the Senator concludes.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I shall be glad to yield to him for the purpose if he wishes to offer his amendment as a separate amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest that that be done.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I make the formal offer of the amendment which I offered to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. I offer it now as an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho offers his amendment as an amendment to the bill; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think it is a happy result that that has worked out in that way, although I do not mean at all to intimate that I am hoping that the Senator from Connecticut will not again offer his amendment.

Mr. WATSON. He will.

Mr. REED. But certainly each of them ought to be taken on its merits.

I have almost finished, Mr. President.

I think every one of us is agreed that we want to see an improvement in prices. I think every one of us will admit that the present situation of depressed commodity prices is an almost intolerable burden upon the debtor class in the United States. Those of us who are in debt are finding far more difficulty in carrying our obligations or in discharging them than we would have with commodity prices at a reasonable level. I think all of us will admit that the present level of commodity prices is about as unnaturally low to-day as it was unnaturally high three years ago.

In that improvement in prices for which we all yearn there must be just one indispensable condition, and that is that the improvement must come from a sound basis. It is easy enough to make an improvement in prices by debasing the currency of the Nation. Last September Great Britain made an improvement in prices, as far as quotations went, of about 30 per cent. Wool and grains of all kinds and cotton, everything that had an international market, jumped 30 per cent overnight on that fateful Monday when Great Britain went off the gold standard. That is not the kind of improvement we mean. We could debase our dollar until it had the same value as South American money, where a so-called dollar has a gold value of 1 cent, and prices would be increased a hundredfold, but none of us would be the least bit better off if we did that. On the other hand, if we can see an increase in price coming about for sound reasons and by sound methods, as in this last month we have seen over 50 per cent increase in prices of hog products, that is the sort of thing over which we can be well content, because it is that kind of increase that spells a return of prosperity to America.

So long as our currency remains upon the gold standard an increase in price means an increase in the prosperity and the well-being of the producers. If we to-day could see grain prices doubled, if we could see cotton at 10 cents instead of 6 or a shade under 6, and if at the same time we kept a sound money, the whole aspect would turn rosy. But we must not yield to the temptation of debasing our currency or increasing its volume by unsound means in order to get a superficial increase in price, which, in the last analysis, is no increase at all, just as it was not in Great Britain.

The Senator from Idaho has said with force that everyone favors an honest dollar; and that is true. If we maintain an honest dollar and secure an increase in prices thereby, everyone is better off; but if we resort to a dishonest dollar and get an apparent increase in prices by that method, nobody will be any better off.

I do not mean to imply that an increase of $1,000,000,000 in the note circulation of our national banks would be a dishonest increase in the currency. I do not think it would be. But I do say that it would be an unwise method of increasing the currency, and it would be a departure from the sound principle of supplying currency needs through the Federal reserve system, which has served us so well in the past. If more currency is needed, the Federal reserve points the way to get it, and allowing $1,000,000,000 to be issued upon the faith of United States bonds would be a reversal to a method which would not be comparable in soundness with the method outlined by the Federal reserve act.

Mark you, if this is good, then why set the limit at the paid-in capital of each bank? Why not make the limit ten times the paid-in capital of each bank, and let the whole American national bank capital stand as the basis for an issue of paper currency? Obviously, in the mind of every one of us that would be an unsound proposal. Obviously, that would mean going off the gold standard. Yet, instead of cutting off the tail of the dog in its entirety, we would by this be taking it off in little bits.

If it is unsound to do it on the wholesale basis, it is unsound to do it to the extent of this single billion dollars.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is usually so logical in his argument that I am rather shocked at his last statement; that is, that if it is unsound to permit the issue of currency, based on all of the bonds of the United States, it is equally unsound to permit an issue on part of them. If that be true, then the issue is unsound on the 2 per cent bonds.

Mr. REED. I think it is. I think it is a very unfortunate method.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator see that at least there is a fair ground on the part of honest students of political economy to believe that our circulation of money ought to be increased? It does not follow because a man believes that that he wants an unlimited increase. There is a vast difference, as I see it, between increasing the currency a billion dollars, and increasing it $10,000,000,000. It seems to me that must be plain.

Mr. REED. It is plain.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, as I understood him, has just contradicted that.

Mr. REED. No; I think the Senator has misunderstood me.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps I have.

Mr. REED. What I tried to point out was that the unsoundness of the method would be better appreciated if we understood it in its extreme application. The Federal reserve law provides a perfectly sufficient method for increasing the currency according to the needs of trade. There is no necessity for this increased currency at the present time, as is shown by the fact that the Federal reserve system has tremendous resources left which would furnish a basis for a larger currency if needed.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, honest men differ as to whether there should be an increase of currency or not. If the Senator's position is right, it seems to me that, in order to be logical, we ought to withdraw from the circulating privilege these 2 per cent bonds.

Mr. REED. I have often dreamed of it. We had an issue of 4 per cent bonds, which carried the circulation privilege, and they matured in 1925. I think every one of us who watched the process was glad to see those bonds paid off and not replaced by others with the circulation privilege. I have dreamed of the day when all of these bonds with the circulation privilege would disappear and when our circulation would be confined entirely to the Federal reserve bank notes and the gold and silver certificates; and they would be adequate for all our necessities.

Mr. NORRIS. When the Federal reserve act was passed that argument was made and given as a reason for its passage. But, coming down to a practical proposition, suppose we followed the logic of the Senator's argument and withdrew the circulation privilege from these 2 per cent bonds; in other words, took away from national banks the right to have any circulation. Does not the Senator think that, without having something to replace that system, different, even, from the Federal reserve system, there would be a very disastrous effect upon the business of the country if we withdraw that privilege and curtailed the circulation that much?

Mr. REED. No; I do not think so, because I think the gap would be instantly filled from the Federal reserve system. But, of course, we are not in a position to consider retiring the 2 per cent bonds now. That is years away, I am afraid, and possibly it is going to be beyond our lifetime.

Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has argued with his usual force what amounts practically to an appeal for the use of the trade dollar, which many economists for years have been urging as a desirable currency, a dollar which would be constant in its purchasing power because based upon the composite value of a wide range of commodities.

There is much to be said in favor of that. It has been a dream of hundreds of economists for many years. But as long as we are on the gold standard it is unthinkable that we should combine it with any kind of a trade-dollar idea. Perhaps when Utopia comes we will have a currency which will never fluctuate in its purchasing power, and that is the trade-dollar idea, which Irving Fisher and others of his school have been urging for so long. But it is the very antithesis of the gold standard, which, up to date, is the best thing which in practice anybody has been able to evolve. The argument in favor of the trade dollar certainly can not be used to justify the expansion of the circulating-note privilege of the national banks.

Now, to sum up. In the first place, we do not need this extra billion dollars of currency.

In the next place, if the demands of trade call for more currency, we have a perfectly sufficient method of getting it through the operations of the Federal reserve system.

In the next place, it is unfair and unjust that the value of the present 2 per cent bonds should be so savagely reduced as it would be by the adoption of this pending amendment, because instead of selling at par, due to their having the circulation privilege, they would instantly revert to an investment status, and their value would go far under par, and there would not be any compensating advantage in an appreciation of the price of the 4¼'s, because the volume of them is nine times the amount that would be necessary for this circulation purpose. There would be nine times as many of the 4¼ per cent bonds out as could be used under this amendment, and the eight-ninths that was not so used would, of course, sell only on its investment basis. So the loss incurred in the 2 per cents would not be made up by an appreciation in the 4¼'s.

Finally it is the wrong basis; it would be a reversal to the financing of the post-Civil War days to issue currency of this kind. It would be a departure from the sound financial thought that was exemplified in the Federal reserve system. It would be a step backward in our fiscal policy; and that is why I hope the Senate will not adopt it.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. I wonder whether the Senator has made any estimate as to the number of national banks that would avail themselves of this opportunity?

Mr. REED. Yes; I think every bank would avail itself of the opportunity to the fullest possible extent.

Mr. COUZENS. Why have they not done so with the 2 per cent?

Mr. REED. They have. They have issued $627,000,000 of currency against their ownership of $670,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds. When we more than double the interest rate the attraction is so great that I should expect every penny of permissible circulation to be issued against the 4¼'s, and it would result in an increase at once of $994,000,000 by the existing banks, and, of course, a further increase by any new banks.

Mr. COUZENS. Is it not a fact that the bankers would be equally unsound if they did that?

Mr. REED. Not a bit of it. From the standpoint of the banker, he will borrow money from Tom, Dick, and Harry at no interest whatever in order to buy a 4¼ per cent investment.

Mr. COUZENS. As a matter of fact, if he has no place to use the money, why would he borrow it?

Mr. REED. How would he use it? He would use it in buying that much more of 4¼ per cent bonds. The very money he withdrew from the Treasury after the deposit of his bonds he would use in paying for the bonds to the former owner. It would be a godsend to the national banks, and if we wanted to make a Christmas present to the national banks of the country, we could do it in no better way than by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. This may not be material, but I think the Senator used the figure of $627,000,000 as indicating the outstanding bank notes. I find from the statement of July 6 of the Treasury that the outstanding national-bank notes were $736,000,000.

Mr. REED. The figure I gave I obtained from the Comptroller of the Currency by telephone about three days ago.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I obtained the figure of $720,000,000 from the Treasurer of the United States; that is, from Mr. Wood.

Mr. REED. The figure was given me over the telephone by the Comptroller of the Currency. The reason I think that the Senator's figure can not be correct is that the total amount of bonds held by the Treasurer of the United States at the close of business on the 30th day of June last, a week ago, was only $670,000,000. Obviously we can not issue notes for more than the face value of those bonds. I do not understand the discrepancy in the figures.

Mr. BLAINE. If I may make a suggestion, is not the discrepancy explained by reason of the older outstanding national-bank notes based upon former issues of United States bonds? For instance, 4 per cent bonds were still in existence down to 1925, and the discrepancy may be due to that fact.

Mr. REED. I think rather it is due to the amount of money deposited in the Treasury by national banks for the redemption of national-bank notes. If they deposit lawful money in the Treasury for the redemption of outstanding notes, that is counted as outstanding money, but they still may issue up to the full amount of their bonds without taking into account that against which they have deposited a redemption fund. That, I believe, explains the discrepancy. There is about $30,000,000 on deposit in the Treasury at this time for the redemption of circulating notes. That is included in the Senator's figures, but not included in the figures I gave.

Mr. BLAINE. But the national-bank notes are still in circulation.

Mr. REED. That may be.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I have no disposition to enter into a technical discussion of the quantitative theory of money. In my own view it has been repeatedly exploded, never more notably than in 1920, when the issue of currency in this country was at its peak, larger than it had ever been theretofore and larger than it has ever been since, and the credits of the 12 Federal reserve banks were at their peak, larger than they have ever been in the history of the system. At the same time commodity prices had dropped distressingly and business was literally at a standstill. The more I read after the professors of political economy the more confused I become and the more I am precluded from applying to these questions the plain common sense of a layman. I have observed many of these professional economists who have come to testify before the various subcommittees of the Committee on Banking and Currency who would go home and change their theory and their statements of fact altogether. One of such gentlemen mentioned by a preceding speaker, now, I believe, associated with the Bank of England as a financial expert, came before a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee having in charge the problem embodied in the so-called Glass bill, and three months after he went home wrote me an extended letter stating that he wanted to modify severely the testimony that he had given before the committee—and, indeed, he needed to do so!

The matter comprised in the pending amendment to me is one of the simplest questions in the world. We had before us the Goldsborough bill to stabilize the dollar, or, rather, to stabilize commodities at a higher than the prevailing price. Everybody is agreed that better commodity prices are desirable, but not all of us believe in chimerical expedients to bring this about. Hence the measure now being here considered. I have never been able to understand how it is humanly possible to "stabilize" the value of the dollar unless we find a way to stabilize the value of the things which the dollar is used to purchase. Talk about "stabilizing the dollar" to me is Greek, and I do not understand the Greek language at all.

In this very respect and in pursuit of this fallacious theory early in the year the Federal Reserve Board and banks entered upon a course of bond purchase with the idea that thereby they would release the indebtedness of the various member banks of the system to the Federal reserve banks, and thus would induce the member banks to discount for their patrons and to renew banking operations on an active scale. In pursuance of that system, the Federal reserve banks have gone into the open money market in the metropolitan districts purchasing bonds, for which they had not one particle of use, to the amazing extent of $900,000,000—now owning a total of one billion eight hundred millions of United States securities—with the idea that these great banks in the money centers would trickle their liquidity down to the member banks throughout the country districts, and thereby induce the member banks throughout the country to embark on a more liberal discounting program and a broader resumption of banking business. The theory was that when this should be done there would be a very appreciable increase in commodity prices. It simply has not worked. There has not been any increase in commodity prices, except in the price of pork or hogs. There has not been any appreciable resumption of discount operations at the member banks. We are in the same state of fear and apprehension in which we have been all along.

I suggested to certain members of the Federal Reserve Board in whose judgment I have great confidence that if inflation of the currency was the trouble we had better have what I term a "diffused inflation" of the currency rather than a centralized attempt at its inflation such as that to which I have referred. Those members of the board agreed with me thoroughly, but seemed unwilling to take responsibility for projecting the suggestion.

The pending question is simply a proposal to authorize the national banks of the country, the smaller banks as well as the larger banks, to increase their loaning facilities. They have their portfolios now crowded with United States bonds to the extent of $4,199,000,000. This is a proposal to permit them to exchange a limited amount of those bonds for circulating notes so that, instead of relying upon the central authorities in great money centers for accommodations, they may use in exchange for circulating notes the bonds that have been crowded on them to the extent of nearly $5,000,000,000.

I took the trouble to ascertain from the director of the banking operations of the Federal Reserve Board the distribution of those bonds, and I shall ask permission to put in the RECORD a statement showing that the distribution, if not ideal, is as nearly so as could be hoped.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think that is a very interesting part of the Senator's remarks. I would like to have him give us the information. If he does not want to read it in detail, at least let us have a general synopsis of where the bonds are.

Mr. GLASS. Very well, if the Senate will have patience.

In the Boston Federal reserve district $232,891,000 of bonds are held in the portfolios of the banks; in New York, $1,630,591,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. REED. Does that mean national banks or member banks?

Mr. GLASS. Member banks, the overwhelming number national banks.

Philadelphia, $279,000,000, in round numbers. I shall not read the odd thousands. Cleveland, $468,000,000; Richmond, $136,000,000; Atlanta, $134,000,000; Chicago, $351,000,000; Dallas, $112,000,000; San Francisco, $461,000,000; making a total of $4,199,000,000. The table in detail follows:

United States Government securities held by all member banks on December 31, 1931, and by weekly reporting member banks on December 30, 1931, and May 18, 1932

[In thousands of dollars]

I also obtained from the director of banks in the Federal reserve system the capitalization of national banks in the various Federal reserve districts in order to determine what increase of circulation would be possible in those respective districts. The capitalization in the various districts reflects a decidedly satisfactory credit basis for the purposes of this bill. It is as follows:

Boston, $151,000,000; New York, $442,000,000; Philadelphia, $123,000,000; Cleveland, $112,000,000; Richmond, $73,000,000; Atlanta, $75,000,000; Chicago, $180,000,000; St. Louis, $55,000,000; Minneapolis, $57,000,000; Kansas City, $82,000,000; Dallas, $77,000,000; San Francisco, $186,000,000; making a total capitalization of the national banks of the country of $1,618,024,000. The table in detail follows:

Capitalization of national banks by Federal reserve districts as of December 31, 1931

District:	Amount
Boston	$151,205,000
New York	442,004,000
Philadelphia	123,477,000
Cleveland	112,288,000
Richmond	73,957,000
Atlanta	75,210,000
Chicago	180,375,000
St. Louis	55,789,000
Minneapolis	57,825,000
Kansas City	82,342,000
Dallas	77,422,000
San Francisco	186,130,000
Total	1,618,024,000

I likewise obtained from the Director of the Banking Division a statement of the outstanding bank-note circulation, which is as follows:

The outstanding national-bank circulation as of December 31, 1931

District:	Amount
Boston	$41,849,000
New York	95,918,000
Philadelphia	57,103,000
Cleveland	68,910,000
Richmond	46,830,000
Atlanta	42,507,000
Chicago	73,576,000
St. Louis	25,909,000
Minneapolis	24,948,000
Kansas City	30,171,000
Dallas	42,602,000
San Francisco	73,911,000
Total	624,234,000

Bonds bearing the circulation privilege approximates $700,000,000, from which fact it is deduced that national banks have omitted to issue the limit of bank-note circulation by nearly $75,000,000.

I also obtained from this official of the Federal reserve system the possible margin of expansion of national-bank notes in the various districts. In Boston the possible expansion is $109,000,000, in New York, $346,000,000, in Philadelphia, $66,000,000, in Cleveland $43,000,000, in Richmond $27,000,000, in Atlanta $32,000,000, in Chicago $107,000,000, in St. Louis $29,000,000, in Minneapolis $32,000,000, in Kansas City $52,000,000, in Dallas $34,000,000, in San Francisco $112,219,000, making a total possible margin of expansion in the country of $994,780,000, and not $14,000,000,000, as the Senator from Pennsylvania suggested in my absence some days ago.

This table in detail is as follows:

Possible margin of expansion of national-bank notes

District:
Boston	$109,356,000
New York	346,086,000
Philadelphia	66,374,000
Cleveland	43,378,000
Richmond	27,127,000
Atlanta	32,693,000
Chicago	107,799,000
St. Louis	29,880,000
Minneapolis	32,877,000
Kansas City	52,171,000
Dallas	34,820,000
San Francisco	112,219,000
Total	994,780,000

Thus, as stated, the extreme margin of expansion under this bill is less than $1,000,000,000; certainly this moderate accretion to the total circulation of the country should not disturb public officials who in recent months have persistently recommended legislative expedients of their own which involved inflation to the amount of $10,000,000,000. So much, in fact, as to have affrighted them into an abandonment of their undigested schemes.

Mr. President, frankly I have not been among those who have imagined that there is an exigent need of expansion of the currency, because, as I pointed out six weeks ago, the member banks of the Federal reserve system alone had in their portfolios nearly $8,000,000,000 of eligible paper and of United States bonds, while they were at that time discounting at the 12 Federal reserve banks to the limited extent of less than $500,000,000. However, I held them, as I insist now, that if there be a need of expansion the surest and altogether the fairest way to bring it about is through the medium of expanding the circulation of the national banks, putting the national banks of all sections of the country upon a fair basis of competition, and affording their respective communities increased credit facilities for the transaction of business.

I am sure there is not a banker in the Senate or in the country who will not be astonished at the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania that there is such a material profit in the circulation privilege. When we enacted the Federal reserve act the consensus of judgment was that the privilege was worth only 1 per cent to the issuing banks, and that amount was largely in excess of the profit that any national banker who ever appeared before the two banking committees of Congress was willing to concede.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator agree with me that whatever the profit on bank circulation is at the present time, the effect of this amendment, if adopted, would be to increase it by 2¼ per cent?

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not agree with that proposition at all; nor do I agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that this action would decrease the value of the 2 per cent bonds. The only real investment value they have now, aside from their face, is the circulation privilege, which we estimated at 1 per cent. Therefore we provided in the Federal reserve act that the 2 per cent bonds might be exchanged for 3 per cent bonds to the extent of $25,000,000 each year for a period of years, feeling that this differential would fully compensate the displacement of national-bank circulation by the issuance of Federal reserve notes.

I agree teetotally with the Senator from Pennsylvania in his statement that a bond-secured currency is an unscientific issue; and for 50 years it was the attempt of Congress, always futile until the enactment of the Federal reserve act, to rid ourselves of a bond-secured currency and supplant it with an automatic currency that would issue upon the demand of commerce and retire at the consummation of all business transactions which it represented; but the process recently adopted by the Federal reserve banks, with the sanction of the Federal Reserve Board, is just the reverse of that.

In their open-market transactions and under the 15-day discount provision of the act having to do largely with speculation on the exchanges, they have attempted to take us back to the bond-secured currency; and, as I have indicated, since the passage of the Glass-Steagall bill they have loaded the portfolios of the Federal reserve banks with nearly a billion dollars of bonds, in addition to a like amount already held, against which they have issued Federal reserve notes and Federal reserve bank credits. It was my conception that if we were to expand our currency at all upon the bond theory, we had better do it as proposed in this measure than to do it after the fashion the Federal reserve banks and board have pursued.

Again, in all frankness, I must say that I have not greatly altered my opinion as to the lack of currency not being our trouble, but what is proposed here is of such a limited nature that if every national bank owning bonds would avail itself 100 per cent of the privilege accorded, we would not yet get back to the per capita circulation which we had 12 years ago.

The per capita circulation in this country in December, 1920, was 52 and a fraction, while the circulation to-day is but 43 and a fraction, a difference of over $9 in money, or over 17 per cent. If every national bank should avail itself to the fullest extent of the privilege here proposed to be extended, it would not take us to the per capita circulation we had 12 years ago.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know whether the Senator has any figures as to the amount of money hoarded in this country; but, so far as I can gather, something over a billion dollars, it is estimated, are now being hoarded; so that if the entire expansion took place to the amount authorized by this bill, it would not cover the amount of money actually in hoarding.

Mr. GLASS. No, it would not; it would scarcely cover the amount of bonds purchased by the Federal reserve banking system within the last few months upon which it issued credit in the futile expectation that such credit would be expanded throughout the country and would revive business.

I am sure that any practical national banker will disagree with the Senator from Pennsylvania about the eagerness of the bankers to take advantage of this privilege. I have a very definite example in mind. In my own community there are three national banks, two of which have issued circulation against their bonds approximately to the limit, and one of which has not issued a single dollar. If the profit were so inviting, that bank, managed by as keen, acute, and acquisitive a set of officials as any bank that I know anything about, would have a million dollars of circulation to-morrow.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Senator calls attention to the fact that many banks do not take advantage of the circulation privilege when their profit is about 1 per cent. Unless my mathematics is all wrong, the effect of this amendment will be to make their profit 3¼ per cent after they have paid the tax on their circulation. Does not the Senator think that will affect their conduct?

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not; and not only that, but I do not think a single national bank is going to issue one dollar of this currency unless there is more or less of an insistent demand for it. The Senator from Pennsylvania, I think, is greatly mistaken if he thinks it is going to cause the organization of hundreds of national banks or that the State banks are going to tumble over one another and desert their State charters and take out national-bank charters. The circulation privilege has never been attractive enough either in prestige or profit for this, as witness the fact that State banks, denied the circulation privilege, outnumber national banks about 3 to 1. Moreover, the Senator from Pennsylvania is utterly mistaken in his supposition that national banks would proceed to buy bonds for the profit in circulation. National banks will not have to expend a single dollar for this purpose. They now have more United States bonds than they can conveniently utilize. They can only utilize them through the Federal reserve banking system in the issuance of currency with a 40 per cent gold base, and national-bank expansion does not require anything of that sort.

The Senator from Pennsylvania in the concluding part of his speech, disclaimed any purpose to discredit the validity of national-bank issues; and yet he laid great stress throughout his remarks upon "fiat money." The Senator does not think, I am sure, that the $680,000,000 of national-bank notes now outstanding constitute in any sense or degree "fiat money."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. REED. I am afraid I must have spoken very badly if I gave the Senator that impression. Of course it is not fiat money; it is an unfortunate and unwise kind of money; but it is perfectly good so long as the credit of the United States is good.

Mr. GLASS. I have always thought that it was an unfortunate, unwise, inelastic, and inoperative currency, for that matter, and for that reason we devised the Federal reserve act eventually to retire it; and it would long ago have been retired but for the fact that the World War came on and we issued so many Government bonds.

The Senator will understand that this measure is not intended to be a permanent proposition at all. The whole thing terminates at the end of five years. For that reason we propose in this bill to modify the existing law with respect to the retirement of national-bank notes at the limit of only $9,000,000 a year. It is a temporary expedient, and I say if "expansion" is really required—not to use the objectionable term "inflation"—if expansion is really required, this is a sane, a simple, and a sound way of expanding the currency to meet the exigencies of this particular time. It can do no harm on earth, because it is a temporary arrangement. It expires by limitation of law, and the only purpose of it, the only purpose of those who suggested it—with a single exception, the unanimous action of the Banking and Currency Committee—was to respond to this insistent demand for currency and credit inflation as a cure for the ills that are now besetting the country.

I can not see that it would possibly do one particle of harm. I can see that it would do some good as an effective foil to some dangerous measures already projected. It would at least release 7,600 national banks from the fear that seems to have possessed them and cause them, in some wholesome measure, to begin the banking business again.

With this brief explanation I do not care to detain the Senate longer.

Mr. BLAINE obtained the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BLAINE. I prefer to proceed. I understand that the Senate is going to take a recess very shortly. I desire very briefly to present my view of the question at this time, following the discussion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The Senator from Virginia was slightly mistaken when he said that the bill, H. R. 11499, as amended, had the unanimous report of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I opposed the adoption of the amendment that was reported by the committee, and which is now the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I was anxious to have the Goldsborough bill reported out, so that the subject might become a matter of discussion, and that we might pass it, but I did not favor, and do not favor now, the amendment as reported out by the committee and as proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly yield for a question?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator intend to address the Senate at length?

Mr. BLAINE. I said that I intended to address the Senate very briefly. I shall not take very long. I suggest that my remarks will probably consume about 15 minutes, if I am not interrupted.

Mr. WATSON. I just wanted to make a motion to go over until to-morrow; but if the Senator prefers to address the Senate this afternoon, I will defer that motion.

Mr. BLAINE. I should prefer to go on.

I want to call attention to a few very pertinent facts.

National-bank notes to-day are issued upon the basis of 2 per cent bonds. Those bonds stand at a premium, in recent months, of about 2⅓ per cent. When bonds that are drawing an interest rate of 4¼ per cent—or 2¼ per cent more than the present bonds which are the basis for national-bank note circulation—are given the same privilege, it is very easy to appreciate that bonds bearing less than 4¼ per cent will take a crash. The amount of depreciation thereon no one can state.

It can be very readily appreciated, also, that the 3 per cent bonds, which are to-day selling at a discount of about 8 per cent, when subjected to the influences that will be brought about by the adoption of this proposed amendment, will further depreciate. How much we do not know. But every bond bearing an interest rate of less than 4¼ per cent is bound to depreciate and depreciate very materially.

I call attention to another very pertinent fact:

The circulating privilege is conducive to the issuing of national-bank notes because of the profits that are made upon the investment. I desire to analyze what those profits are. The Comptroller of the Currency has issued a table respecting those profits. That table includes as a deduction the sinking fund in respect to the 2 per cent bonds; but that sinking fund is always invested, is always an income-producing fund; so that should be eliminated from our calculation when we desire to arrive at the actual return upon the investment.

The Comptroller of the Currency also includes 6 per cent on the investment, which, of course, is included as a part of the total net return upon the amount of money invested by a national bank in the purchase of bonds and in issuing its notes.

I am going to use this illustration:

We will assume that there is a $100,000 proposal for national-bank notes. Taking the figures for 1929, a national bank would have had to purchase a like amount of Panama Canal bonds at the market price of 102.338, or a total cost of $102,338. The national bank is required to make a deposit of 5 per cent of its circulation in the redemption fund. Therefore it would have to deposit $5,000 and receive a net circulation of $95,000 in return for an original investment of $102,338.

This is the set up. It consists of a premium of $2,338 and a redemption fund of $5,000, or a total net investment of $7,338. Upon this investment the bank receives an income of $2,000—that is, the interest on the 2 per cent bonds. Its expenses, according to the Comptroller of the Currency, are as follows:

For tax, $500. Other expenses: The average cost, according to the Comptroller of the Currency, is $62.50. That makes a total expense of $562.50, subtracted from $2,000, the income, which makes a net return of $1,437.50. This net income on a total investment of $7,338 is an annual rate of return amounting to 19½ per cent upon the actual money invested.

Therefore the proposition is very inviting; and it will be observed, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has pointed out, that the national banks have availed themselves of the privilege and have absorbed most of the 2 per cent bond.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs me of another very significant fact. The total interest the Government of the United States has paid to national banks for the privilege they have in issuing national-bank notes, from the time such bank notes have been authorized, down to and including 1931, is $892,173,366.10.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs me in a letter dated April 7, 1932, that the average annual interest that the Federal Government pays to the national banks for issuing the national-bank notes is $13,316,000. In other words, it has cost the Government of the United States on an average $13,316,000 a year for the past 67 years for the privilege which the national banks exercise in issuing national-bank notes. The Government pays on its 2 per cent bonds to the national banks over $13,000,000 a year in interest, and the national banks issue money against those bonds and the Government guarantees that money, and in effect pays interest on its own money.

Mr. FLETCHER. Interest on the bonds?

Mr. BLAINE. Interest on the bonds; and the national banks receive as a return upon their net investment 19½ per cent. Therefore the proposition is a very attractive one, and it appears obvious to me that when we make 4¼ per cent bonds eligible for national-bank note circulation the national banks will receive a greater net return upon the actual money they invest, and all other bonds issued by the Government are bound to take a slump.

Mr. President, to my way of thinking there is more danger in this proposed amendment than in any other proposal relating to our monetary system that has been seriously considered at this session of the Congress.

If we are going to undertake to increase the circulating medium through some system of this kind, why not make all Federal bonds eligible as a basis for the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes by the Federal reserve banks? Whatever profits then made in issuing the Federal reserve bank notes would be turned into the Federal Treasury as a part of the franchise tax as now provided by law.

Therefore, Mr. President, this proposition means this: That in the issuing of future United States bonds we will be compelled, in order to maintain their value at par, to make every bond draw as high a rate of interest as does any existing bond. It also means that all bonds of the Federal Government bearing less than 4¼ per cent are bound to crash in the market, and that we can reasonably anticipate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator realizes, I take it, that these 2 per cent bonds are already held by the banks, owned by the banks, and mostly by the very large banks.

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly; the 2 per cent bonds are. Of course, as those 2 per cent bonds are retired by the Federal Government, as they are paid off, bonds drawing a higher rate of interest can be substituted for them.

All other bonds which are eligible, but which draw a lower rate of interest than 4¼ per cent, and particularly the 3 per cent bonds, selling now at around 92, we all must understand would be subjected to a tremendous depreciation.

That would not occur under the Glass-Steagall bill, as all bonds hold a relative value as a basis for the issuing of Federal reserve notes, and it would not occur under the Goldsborough bill.

Mr. President, the added amount of currency would have little or no influence upon the present situation. We would assure a depreciation in our Federal bonds, and it would mean that all future bonds issued by the Government would bear the highest prevailing rate of interest, and the national banks would make a return upon their investment far above their present return of 19½ per cent.

The national banks of to-day hold 4¼ per cent bonds. Every one of them would at once indulge the privilege of issuing national-bank notes to the limit, and every one of them would receive a return upon the actual money invested of twice the amount that is received under the Panama or 2 per cent bonds. It would be an invitation for the creation of additional national banks, with no assurance that the added currency would ever reach those who produce the commodities of our country or render the labor necessary for the production of those commodities. The probabilities are that the added currency would find its way at once into the stock market and speculation.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 10600. An act to exempt from the quota husbands of American citizens; and

H. J. Res. 336. Joint resolution construing section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930.

ACQUISITION OF LAND ADJACENT TO BOLLING FIELD

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Calendar No. 1077, an important bill recommended by the department and favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. It is the bill (H. R. 11732) to amend section 2 of an act approved February 25, 1929 (45 Stat. 1303), to complete the acquisition of land adjacent to Bolling Field, D. C., and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 2, line 3, to strike out "numberel" and insert "numbered," and on page 2, after line 22, to insert new sections 3 and 4, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act approved February 25, 1929 (45 Stat. 1303), authorizing the Secretary of War to acquire by purchase or condemnation real estate adjacent to Bolling Field, Washington, District of Columbia, for the extension and development of said flying field, is hereby amended so as to increase the amount therein authorized to be appropriated from $666,000 to $714,420.12, which amount includes the sum of $16,791.21, the balance due on two parcels of land numbered 13 and 14, for which final judgment in condemnation proceedings has been entered against the United States of America, together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest at the rate stipulated and in accordance with the judgments rendered.

SEC. 2. That of the $42,000 authorized by an act approved February 18, 1928 (45 Stat. 129), appropriated by the act approved March 23, 1928 (45 Stat. 338), and continued available until expended by the act approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 909), for the construction of an administration building at Bolling Field, so much as may be necessary is hereby authorized to be made available for the completion of the acquisition of the remaining parcels of real estate adjacent to said flying field not heretofore taken under declarations of taking pursuant to provisions of an act approved March 1, 1929 (45 Stat. 1415), authorized to be acquired by an act approved February 25, 1929, supra, including interest at the rate stipulated and in accordance with judgments.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized in his discretion (1) to terminate the contract entered into June 1, 1925, between the United States and A. T. Williams, of Jacksonville, Fla., for the sale and purchase of the St. Johns Bluff Military Reservation, in Florida, (2) to execute a quitclaim deed therefor to A. T. Williams, or his executors, upon the receipt of an amount including interest aggregating not less than ten times the official appraised value made of said reservation prior to the time it was offered for sale.

SEC. 4. Nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the Secretary of War to refund any sum of money received as principal or as interest under the provisions of the contract of sale and purchase entered into with A. T. Williams for the St. Johns Bluff Military Reservation, and the acceptance of the deed hereby authorized shall constitute a final and complete bar, accord and satisfaction to any claim by any person for any such refund in whole or in part.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CONDITION OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by an outstanding agriculturist in my State, Mr. W. P. Buchanan, of Washington County, Va., entitled "What Is the Matter with Agriculture?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Something is radically wrong. The symptoms are unmistakable. The condition has persisted for more than a decade. It is noticeable that no effective remedy has been applied; every treatment administered has left the patient in a progressively worse condition. Upon the principle that every effect is due to a cause, the thoughtful farmer is beginning to doubt the accuracy of the various diagnoses. This suggests to his mind the need of a change of doctors—the only really hopeful symptom the patient has shown.

The condition complained of is not so complicated that it can not be understood. The average farmer's budget is unbalanced. That much is quite plain. It is equally clear that his budget can be balanced only by either reducing his outgo or increasing his income, or by both. The writer would suggest both, with this qualification—reduce expenditures for nonessentials and if need be spend more for essentials. The cost of a plan or practice is not all important if it is done in the right way and if it is within one's means; the vital question is: Will the result show a profit, and will the profit be sufficiently great to justify the risk involved?

SUBSIDY NOT WANTED

Most, if not all, of the major farm relief plans advanced up to this time involve a Federal subsidy, indirectly though it be. As a close-to-the-soil farmer who lived on the farm let me say positively that I do not believe that farmers as a class, and but a few as individuals, want any subsidy. Neither do they want organized interference, governmental or otherwise, with the natural flow of farm commodities in commerce. The farmer, more than anyone else, knows that nature will ultimately have her way; and he prefers that natural methods direct the course of his commodities after they have been produced.

In the production end it is well known that natural laws can not successfully be set aside; by now it is surely understood that such artificial barriers as holding a rapidly accumulating surplus, with no control over production, can have but one possible result. We now suffer from that result. Furthermore, the mere size of the present governmental operations in certain agricultural commodities intimidates the normal trader and deters him from normal operations. Certain of them are called "gamblers," I believe. As a gambler, who equals the farmer? But right here let's be honest with ourselves: If you had a thousand bushels of wheat for sale or a crop of cotton, or of corn, would you prefer 1 bidder or 10 bidders? If the commodity exchanges suffer from evil practices, by all means correct them—but do not destroy natural markets because unprincipled individuals sometimes use them for dishonest purposes.

FARMER MUST EMULATE BIG-BUSINESS SOUND PRACTICES

The farmer needs to follow some of the despised practices of big business. For instance, in normal times the manufacturer fixes the price of his product; only, however, as he fits production to consumptive demand. It is encouraging to note that similar plans for the control of agricultural production are now being developed. Times like these are being utilized by progressive manufacturers both to gage the future and to prepare for it; to improve methods of production; to improve the article produced; and where the need is indicated, to bring out even entirely new articles. How can the farmer adapt that principle? By developing and broadening the scope of his vision and by sound, constructive thinking. Granting that there may be exceptions—but the writer knows of none—there are probably few important agricultural sections of the United States in which new lines could not be profitably adopted to some degree.

IMPORTANCE OF LITTLE THINGS

As does the manufacturer, especially in times like the present, so also must the farmer pay more attention to the little things. In the very nature of his business the successful farmer must do this at all times. Speaking in a general way, the loss of this one point is sufficient to spell the difference between profit and loss. World War prices and conditions dulled perception of the value of little things. Everybody thought in large sums. The farmer was no exception, but it seems to have done him more permanent injury than almost any other class; possibly due to the fact that he is his own boss.

It may not be amiss at this point to recommend a very fine piece of agricultural literature to the farmer who reads this article. I refer to one of the older works, and yet it is right up to the minute. Its circulation is tremendous, but it is evidently given too little consideration in recent years by many people in arranging their daily reading. While not written primarily as a work on agriculture, I have yet to find its equal even for that purpose. It describes the master farmer's wife, treats of livestock, agronomy, and deals with all the farmer's problems. In this connection I would call the reader's attention to second chapter, fifteenth verse, of Songs of Solomon: "Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vineyards."

THE FARMER MUST STOP DECEIVING HIMSELF

We farmers need to be honest with ourselves. Are we? I would like to stress that. It is no idle comment. To deceive another is indefensible; to deceive one's self is utterly foolish. How many times do we deliberately fool ourselves in our planning or execution? It is generally in our execution; at times it is so much easier to do a thing an easy way than to do it the best way. Right there millions of dollars of losses are sustained annually by the farmers of this country. Perhaps farmers have more general knowledge of their occupation than any other class of people and use it less wisely.

If that remark nettles you, please remember that it is written by a farmer out of abundant experience and observation. We need to think more. We need constructive imagination. We need courage. What does this mean? First, make an accurate mental picture of your own farm and its various productive possibilities, not only the things which you are doing more or less through force of habit but the other things you might do; study carefully competitive conditions and see how they may be met or avoided, and having done these summon a high order of courage to carry through your plans. This requires clear and sound thinking, which of itself is stimulating. All of this is said in spite of the fact that so many politicians and would-be leaders of agriculture act as though they thought that the farmer had neither the right nor the capacity to think. He has both. Unfortunately he exercises neither to anything like the extent his problems require.

Abandon old practices, if unprofitable, and substitute new ones in a careful, constructive way. All of this may sound like plain talk. It is. It is so intended. The largest industry in this country is bogged down; not just temporarily, as will presently be shown, and it is time for a plain and sincere discussion of the reasons for that condition with a view to finding sound remedies of a permanent character. Let us keep constantly before us the idea that this calls also for plain, straight thinking upon the part of the individual farmer as much as on the part of those who are directing the various agencies which are endeavoring to benefit him. Without straight thinking and well-considered action on the part of the individual farmer, no amount of governmental assistance is going to do him any good. I believe there is no other approach to a permanent solution. Continued use of many methods and ideas of the preceding generation is to no little degree responsible for agriculture's present plight.

For instance, in certain sections where it costs considerably more than a dollar a bushel to produce wheat, why deliberately continue to attempt to compete with low-cost areas? And wheat is not the only crop produced under similar impossible conditions. But to merely discontinue unprofitable hoary practices is not enough. That is only the half of it. Profitable substitutes must be adopted. Of course, that requires thought and lots of it. I doubt if there is an important agricultural community in the entire country in which one or more successful individual farmers do not stand out because of their practice of that doctrine.

INVEST IN ESSENTIALS

It requires the expenditure of money to make money, in farming as in other lines of endeavor. It will bear repeating that essential expenditures should come first; and in these times we need to be as certain as can be of the accuracy of our judgment as to what is essential. Most of us have been spending for the wrong things, and are still doing it; not necessarily spending too much, if only we spent for the right things. But we must keep within our means. Easy credit in nearly every direction has been our undoing.

TAX BURDEN DELAYS RETURN TO NORMAL

The farmers have at least one thing in common with wealth and big business—together we pay most of the country's tax bill. Not only as to the farmer, but I think it may be said of these others as well, perhaps the greatest obstacle to a return to normal business conditions is the crushing tax burden. Correction of this is more difficult because of interest and sinking-fund payments on debts resulting from our orgy of public spending during the "new era" and also because of multiplied bureaus and agencies of doubtful value. Interest now being manifested in Government and tax matters—local, State, and National—is a fine thing and will no doubt lead to an improved situation.

WHAT GOVERNMENT SHOULD DO AND WHAT IT SHOULD NOT DO

Some say the way out is for the farmer to produce less. That is undoubtedly true of certain commodities and would appear to apply to all major farm crops just at this time. But to ignore for the moment our immediate problem of surpluses, and take a long-time view of the farming industry as a whole, we need developments in opposite directions, as follows:

(1) For some of the major crops, as the cereals and cotton, we need wider outlets. While present avenues of consumption can and will absorb larger quantities of these commodities under more favorable conditions than obtain at the present time, that alone is not sufficient. Development of new uses is important. For example, the cotton plant has almost unlimited possibilities in addition to its present ordinary uses. Some important work has been done along this line; but, in relation to its importance to the entire world, the surface has scarcely been scratched. This very thing constitutes a challenge to our very best scientific thought. Who knows but that developments along this line may supply the stimulus to revive industry and put it on the road to heights of achievement never before attained? Why continue to pour out public funds for alleged farm relief in ways that, no one will deny, have done serious injury to the intended beneficiaries, not to mention evil effects upon practically every other element in the community? Use a small amount of that total in a business-like way to create something constructive and of permanent value. It would not require nearly so many millions as have been wasted up to the present time in trying to do the impossible. A determined effort to find new and profitable commercial uses for certain of the crops, an effort comparable to that of science during the World War period, should bring fine results. In the nature of the case this is largely governmental function. Such an accomplishment would justify an even larger volume of production of such crops—and likely lower the cost per unit.

(2) There should be established a system of control to regulate, annually, agricultural production so as to adjust the quantity of the various crops to the probable requirements. This is regarded by many as entirely practicable. A definite plan is now being considered. Until this or some other effective device is adopted for control of production it is sheerest folly to spend hundreds of millions of dollars in so-called stabilization efforts. Some industries have such a short process of manufacture that they are able to operate for a single day and then close down for the balance of the week if the 1-day operation supplies their orders for that period; others, having a longer process, regulate production to demand in periods of a month or longer. The farmer's period of production being longer, as to some crops the entire year and even longer than that, it is necessary that his new supplies of commodities be adjusted to prospective demand by annual periods. To emphasize this point let's suppose that a manufacturer's volume of production were inflexible, so that he found it impossible to adjust it to demand except at the end of each year. Where would he find himself ultimately? Conversely, if the farmer's production were based upon a reliably estimated need, the determining factor in his profits would be largely his ability to produce a superior article relatively cheap.

In any event we must get away from the idea of price fixing as a solution of our troubles. Let economic laws fix the price; it is then up to the individual farmer to produce at a cost to show a profit, lose money, or try some other crop or occupation. Exactly the same economic laws govern in agriculture as in banking or in other business. The utter fallacy of doctrines to the contrary has been abundantly demonstrated during the last two or three years.

A sick world is crying for relief from the false economic theories and bad individual practices which have brought it to its present deplorable condition.

Before closing let me mention one other thing. It has to do with the farmer's morale. For a long time, up until about two years ago, both press and platform dwelt at length upon the farmer's pitiable plight. It is a high tribute to his moral stamina that he did not surrender under it all. I think it is a tribute to his common sense as well. Amongst the several blessings that flow to the farmer from the present depression—and they are many, both as to the farmer and others as well—may be mentioned the fact that the manufacturers, merchants, and bankers have all been so occupied with their own problems that they have had no time to shed crocodile tears over the plight of the farmer.

Give us a sincere and earnest effort by our best scientific talent, governmentally directed, to establish new and profitable commercial uses for farm commodities; an effective system for adjusting production to probable requirements; take the insincere-type politician and the professional would-be agricultural leader off of our backs, and substitute in their stead some real honest-to-goodness farmers in the higher councils of governmental agriculture, and the farmer will stage his comeback along with the other industries, if not earlier.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Manufactures an editorial on unemployment relief entitled "This Can Not Be Delayed," appearing in the Washington Daily News of to-day, July 8, 1932.

There being no objection, the editorial was referred to the Committee on Manufactures and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News, July 8, 1932]

THIS CAN NOT BE DELAYED

The House of Representatives has adopted a compromise relief bill not particularly satisfactory to anyone, violently opposed by many. It will be killed either by the Senate or by the President. The work of getting tangible, practical relief to the people who need it must start again at the beginning.

This time politics should be left out of the discussion. Success in a political campaign is important to a great many people, but it is far more important that citizens be saved from suffering and that the country be saved from the wrath of men made desperate by want.

It is important, first, that adequate funds be provided to assure care for all who may be in need. Some weeks ago the Senate passed an emergency hunger relief bill, separating this fund from the controversial provisions of the present measure which are intended to lessen unemployment. Speaker GARNER prevented passage of this emergency bill, forcing it to travel the slow, troublesome path of the other relief provisions.

Without delay both Houses should make money available to the States for this purpose. They should be very sure that the amount is sufficient to meet all needs.

In his proposal that the Government take over the function heretofore performed by banks and loan to private business firms and to individuals, Speaker JOHN GARNER has raised a fundamental economic question. It has never been debated adequately in either House of Congress nor in the committees of either House. It is not enough for GARNER and his friends to say in its defense that help must be given the little fellow as well as the big industries on top. Nor is it enough for the President to say in opposition that the proposal would lead the Government into pawnbroking on a gigantic scale.

Most of us will agree with the purpose announced by GARNER. On the other hand, most of us want to be shown that the Garner plan actually will bring benefit to men at the bottom of the economic scale, that it will do something to increase the purchasing power of the country rather than simply increase further or maintain the producing power.

A study of this problem should have been started months ago. The lateness of the day is added reason why it should be undertaken at once. Committees of the Senate and House, or a joint nonpartisan committee of both Houses, should review the whole problem at once with expert assistance. They should consider at the same time the interesting proposal of the railroad brotherhoods, sponsored by Senator COSTIGAN and Representative LAGUARDIA, for putting Government credit behind needy consumers.

Such a study should not take long. Congress should wait in Washington until it is completed and should then, at last, come to grips with the problem—the problem of creating work for those who have none and restoring the general purchasing power as the first essential step toward making industry function normally again.

But in the matter of direct relief to prevent suffering there is no excuse for any delay. Such a bill should be passed separately, at once. To hold it back for political advantage is little short of criminal.

HIGHWAY ACROSS MILITARY RESERVATION, SPRINGFIELD ARMORY, MASS.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] I ask unanimous consent that Calendar 1076 may be considered. It is almost a private bill authorizing the city of Springfield, Mass., to build a highway bridge across a part of the Springfield Armory property. It is recommended by the War Department and opposed by nobody.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 7293) requesting the Secretary of War to grant to the city of Springfield, Mass., permission to construct and maintain a highway and bridge across the United States military reservation at the Springfield Armory, Mass., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant to the city of Springfield, Mass., permission to construct and to maintain a highway across the United States military reservation of the Springfield Armory and, as part thereof, a highway bridge across the Watershops Pond upon said reservation, the highway and bridge to be not over 100 feet in width, except as bridge abutments may of necessity exceed that width; the aforesaid highway and highway bridge to be located, at the option of the city of Springfield, Mass., at any position between the two limit lines marked "A–A" and "B–B" upon the plat S. A. 6066, dated October 19, 1931, and approved November 30, 1931, which limit lines are further described as follows, namely:

Line "A–A": Starting at a point on the northerly line of Hickory Street 161 feet westerly from the stone bound marking the northeasterly point of the intersection of Hickory Street and Whitman Street and running thence south 36° 35'' west to and beyond the southerly shore line of Watershops Pond, crossing the boundary of the United States military reservation at two points approximately as follows: One on the line joining corners 158 and 159 of Plate X of Springfield Armory land plans book at a distance of about 35 feet easterly from corner 158 and the other point on the line joining corners 706 and 707 at a point about 35 feet northeasterly from corner 707.

Line "B–B": Starting at a point on northwesterly line of Hickory Street 65 feet southerly from a stone bound on said line of Hickory Street which is located approximately 45 feet south from the southerly side of Bonnyview Avenue, and running thence south 24° 4' 55'' east to and beyond the southerly shore line of Watershops Pond, crossing the boundary line of the United States military reservation at two points approximately as follows: One on line adjoining corners 176 and 175 at a distance of about 20 feet southwesterly from corner 176 and the other point on the line joining corners 683 and 684 at a point about 125 feet, approximately, from corner 683: Provided, however, That prior to construction of said highway and highway bridge across the aforesaid reservation, plans showing the location and design thereof shall be submitted to the commanding officer of the Springfield Armory, and by that officer approved as providing adequate clear channel for stream flow and as otherwise free from interference with the proper interests of the United States in and to the aforesaid reservation and the Watershops Pond located thereupon: Provided further, That the construction of said highway and bridge and the maintenance thereof shall be without cost to the United States.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to the city of Springfield, Mass., permission to construct and maintain a highway bridge across United States military reservation at the Springfield Armory, Mass."

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JULY 8, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Harvey H. Harmon, minister National City Christian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Thou who art our God and Father, we pause in quiet that we may be conscious of Thy presence in this hour. We thank Thee for Thy infinite goodness and tender mercies. We pray to-day that Thou wilt illumine our minds, open our hearts, and renew our souls. In our desire to fulfill Thy purpose in our lives, that Thy will may be done in this body of men and women and throughout our blessed country, we seek Thy guidance in the deliberations and commitments of this day.

O Thou who art the God of this Nation and of the whole earth, renew our faith in Thee and in all mankind. May we have fellowship with Thee this day in solving the destinies of our land.

Be with our loved ones and bless all homes of our land. May the earth be filled with Thy glory, and to Thee shall be the praise forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 462. Joint resolution making an appropriation to provide transportation to their homes for veterans of the World War temporarily quartered in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 2, and the amendment to the title to the bill (H. R. 7939) entitled "An act to authorize the presentation of a distinguished-flying cross to Russell N. Boardman and John L. Polando, and Wiley Post and Harold Gatty, and for other purposes."

BEER

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute and a half in order to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to inform my colleagues that 76 wet Republicans on this side have petitioned the Speaker as follows:

HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., July 7, 1932.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
Speaker House of Representatives,
The Capitol, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: We, the undersigned, hereby respectfully request that the House of Representatives have an opportunity, before the adjournment of the present session of Congress, to vote on a bill legalizing the manufacture, transportation, and sale of beer, and providing additional revenue for the United States Treasury by taxing such beer.

We are taking this unusual procedure for the reason that we belong to the minority party of the House, while you and your party are in control of all the parliamentary machinery necessary to bring such a bill before the House.

Inasmuch as both parties are now on record for a change in the prohibition policy of the United States Government, and inasmuch as there is no doubt that, regardless of the outcome of the next election, repeal of the eighteenth amendment will be submitted to the States of the Union for their respective ratification, there can be no honest justification for delaying an amendment to existing prohibition enforcement laws permitting the manufacture, transportation, and sale of alcoholic beverages within the limits of the existing constitutional provisions, thereby reducing the enormous cost of attempted enforcement, and also bringing in additional hundreds of millions of dollars revenue to the United States Treasury, now so badly depleted.

All we ask is the opportunity to vote for a beer bill before we adjourn.

Respectfully submitted.

William E. Hull, Illinois, acting chairman Republican wet group; Ruth Pratt, New York; William H. Stafford, Wisconsin; Wilbur M. White, Ohio; George N. Seger, New Jersey; Edward Lowber Stokes, Pennsylvania; I. H. Doutrich, Pennsylvania; Florence P. Kahn, California; W. A. Pittenger, Minnesota; W. G. Andrews, New York; John C. Organized labor, Mr. Speaker, strongly indorses efforts for immediate modification of the Volstead Act. Following is a telegram received by me from Matthew Woll, president of Labor's National Committee for Modification of the Volstead Act, July 7, 1932:

On behalf of Labor's National Committee for Modification of the Volstead Act, we sincerely hope that all Members of the Senate and House who recognize need for immediate change in present conditions will join in supporting the bills modifying present Volstead Act. We sincerely hope forces favoring modification of Volstead Act will not become divided to the point of permitting defeat because of difference as to alcoholic content. We trust you will leave no stone unturned to secure immediate modification of Volstead Act, especially in view of both political party conventions having expressed dissatisfaction with present prohibition situation.

MATTHEW WOLL,
President Labor's National Committee for Modification of Volstead Act.

FEES FOR DOMESTIC MONEY ORDERS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill H. R. 10246, to fix the fees to be charged for the issue of domestic money orders, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a conference report on the bill H. R. 10246 and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the conferees.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10246) to fix the fees to be charged for the issue of domestic money orders, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, and 3.

JAS. M. MEAD,
M. A. ROMJUE,
JOHN H. MOREHEAD,
A. D. SANDERS,
CLYDE KELLY,
Managers on the part of the House.

TASKER L. ODDIE,
GEO. H. MOSES,
PORTER H. DALE,
PARK TRAMMELL,
KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10246) to fix the fees to be charged for the issue of domestic money orders submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The managers on the part of the House insisted upon the House bill because it contained a specific schedule of rates applying to domestic money orders, while the Senate amendment conferred the power of establishing these rates upon the Postmaster General. The managers on the part of the House believe that the authority for setting the rates should be left with the Congress, and therefore insisted upon the House bill, and the managers on the part of the Senate concurred, the report being agreed to unanimously.

JAS. M. MEAD,
M. A. ROMJUE,
JOHN H. MOREHEAD,
A. D. SANDERS,
CLYDE KELLY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman should state to the House that the Senate has virtually agreed to the House bill.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin let me say this is one of the bills that was reported by the Post Office Committee, with the department's approval, as a revenue-producing measure. It increases the rates on domestic money orders. The committee and the House decided that the Congress should set the rates rather than permit the Postmaster General to do so. The Senate amended the bill giving the Postmaster General authority to establish the rates. The House conferees insisted that the rates be set by the Congress, and the Senate conferees receded and agreed with the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. When will these proposed rates go into effect? A Senate amendment provided that they shall go into effect July 1, 1932, to which the House conferees disagreed. I assume that they will go into effect from the time of the enactment of the law, as I notice from the original House bill that no date is fixed in the bill as to when they shall go into effect.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman is correct. The rates will go into effect on the day on which the bill is approved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

POSTAGE CHARGE ON UNDELIVERED SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill H. R. 10494, to provide a postage charge on notices to publishers regarding undeliverable second-class matter, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the conferees.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10494) to provide a postage charge on notices to publishers regarding undeliverable second-class matter having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted in said amendment insert the following: "except that where the undeliverable copies bear the pledge of the sender to pay the return postage no notice shall be sent to the publisher, but the copies received during the period specified in this paragraph shall be returned charged with postage due at the rate of 1 cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof, with a minimum charge of 2 cents, and indorsed to show the reason they are undeliverable and the new address of the addressee, if known"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JAS. M. MEAD,
M. A. ROMJUE,
JOHN H. MOREHEAD,
A. D. SANDERS,
CLYDE KELLY,
Managers on the part of the House.

TASKER L. ODDIE,
GEO. H. MOSES,
PORTER H. DALE,
PARK TRAMMELL,
KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10494) to provide a postage charge on notices to publishers regarding undeliverable second-class matter, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The managers on the part of the House objected to the Senate amendment which, as it was written, set a fee of 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fraction thereof, with a minimum charge of 2 cents, for the return to the sender of undeliverable copies of second-class matter bearing the pledge of the sender to pay the return postage. The House managers insisted on an amendment reducing the amount of 4 ounces to 2 ounces. This amendment the managers on the part of the Senate concurred in, and the report was unanimous.

JAS. M. MEAD,
M. A. ROMJUE,
JOHN H. MOREHEAD,
A. D. SANDERS,
CLYDE KELLY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

STATE OF THE UNION

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the President's message.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the situation, nothing more will be brought up this afternoon. There will be no more business this afternoon?

Mr. RAINEY. No.

Mr. SNELL. All that will be done will be debate by gentlemen who desire to address the House?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And may I inquire whether it is planned to have a session to-morrow?

Mr. RAINEY. We will determine that later in the afternoon.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, if the Senate is not making progress on the relief bill so that it will be considered to-day, it is planned by the majority leader to adjourn over until Monday?

Mr. RAINEY. It is.

Mr. SNELL. One further question. I understand the division of time will be left with the chairman, and the time will be equally divided?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, the time on the minority side to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and the time on the majority side to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the President's message, and, pending that motion, asks unanimous consent that the time be equally divided and controlled on the minority side by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and the time on the majority side by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the President's message, with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the President's divers and sundry messages.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he desires to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, this session of Congress is drawing to a close, and before we meet again a new Congress will have been selected.

As I look on this side of the House and see those with whom I have served so long, it occurs to me that it is most unfortunate that in the great State of Missouri there has not been a redistricting of the congressional districts. In a State of diversified interests, covering a vast amount of territory, the importance of local or district representation can not be overestimated.

Hence, I, as the Democratic leader, regret that the members of the Missouri delegation are compelled to run in the State at large. The members of this delegation have both ability and experience, which with the seniority rule, give them a place of power and influence in this body that comes only as a result of long service and which no new Member can acquire until he has had years of experience. I can safely say, speaking for those on the Democratic side of the House—and I might add those on the other side of the House—that these Missouri Members have rendered to the people of Missouri valuable, faithful, and efficient service and by reason of their ability, long experience, intimate knowledge of economic problems and legislative procedure are now in a position to render a much greater service to their State and Nation. I refer to MILTON A. ROMJUE, RALPH F. LOZIER, JACOB L. MILLIGAN, JOSEPH B. SHANNON, C. C. DICKINSON, ROBERT D. JOHNSON, WILLIAM L. NELSON, CLARENCE CANNON, JOHN J. COCHRAN, CLYDE WILLIAMS, JAMES F. FULBRIGHT, and WILLIAM E. BARTON.

If there was ever a time when a State needs sound, seasoned, and experienced men in Congress, that time is now.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, letters and telegrams are now coming in from banks in all sections of the country reporting on the first collection of the tax on bank checks. The tax has been in operation less than 30 days, and yet the figures available as of July 1 indicate unmistakably the general effect of the tax to date and the further results to be expected in the immediate future.

Three ominous developments are to be noted.

First. The tax is failing to produce the revenue which was anticipated. The amount collected by the average bank up to July 1 was far below the amount expected by the Treasury Department, and will be even farther below the estimates on August 1. It is the consensus of opinion among bankers that the tax will produce on a ratio of constantly diminishing returns as the public becomes familiar with its operation and with methods by which it may be avoided.

Second. It has reduced to an alarming extent the number of small accounts carried in the banks. This is especially true in rural communities. Banks from every section report the withdrawal of funds following the imposition of the tax, and I am in receipt of numerous protests saying it has completely nullified the effects of the antihoarding campaign. Small depositors refuse to submit to a tax on withdrawals and are carrying currency to pay their bills and secreting their surplus. The amount withdrawn since the tax became effective reaches a staggering sum and is mounting daily. The consequent inconvenience to business, which has become accustomed to depend on bank records, and the invitation to crime attracted by the amounts known or believed to be in private hands is becoming a serious menace to the public welfare.

Third. And, most important of all, the heavy withdrawal of funds and the consequent stagnation of business are materially reducing the amounts available in the average bank—and especially in the country banks—for loans. A bank can lend only in proportion to its deposits. The reduction of surplus funds in the banks means inevitably a restriction of credits and the calling of loans or the refusal of loans at a time when liquid funds are desperately needed. Credit was never so in demand for the orderly processes of legitimate business as now, and this tax is drying up the springs of credit at the source.

Mr. Chairman, the situation is imperative. The tax should be repealed and it should be repealed before Congress adjourns. [Applause.] I have introduced a joint resolution for its repeal, which has been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. I sincerely hope Congress will remain in session long enough to permit the committee to give it consideration. No tax imposed in recent years affects so directly and so drastically the welfare of the people and the prosperity of the Nation. If allowed to remain on the statute books, this brake upon the wheels of business will work immeasurable harm during the five or six months Congress is in vacation. Let us have an opportunity to consider it at the earliest date possible and repeal it before adjournment. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLINS. I have likewise introduced a joint resolution for the repeal of this tax on checks, and it has been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CANNON. The demand for relief comes from all parts of the country. I trust the committee will take early action on these bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL].

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, before the flood of political oratory is turned loose in the House this afternoon, I wish to seriously call to the attention of the Members a matter which ought to be given preferential consideration before we adjourn. Before I refer to it, however, I want to take this opportunity to thank the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], who just preceded me, and to indorse the resolution which he has introduced to repeal the tax on bank checks. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. PURNELL. I can not yield just now.

We all realize how hard it is to repeal or amend any legislative enactment within a few days, weeks, or months after it has been placed upon the statute books, but we ought not to hesitate to correct flagrant errors when we know them to exist. I shall not discuss the tax on bank checks further than to say that the short time in which that tax has been in operation has demonstrated most clearly and forcibly the great hardship it is working upon our farmers and the people who issue small checks throughout the country. I know of no reason why our Committee on Ways and Means, composed as it is of the strong characters of this House, should not recognize this evil and take the necessary steps to remove this curse which has been saddled upon the people of this country who write checks.

I asked to follow the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], because I wanted to call attention to another injustice which, in my judgment, is even more serious than this tax on bank checks. I refer to the 400 per cent increase in tax which was placed on sales of produce for future delivery. We are now about to market the wheat crop of this country. With conditions existing throughout the world and throughout this country that would, under normal and ordinary circumstances, bring about a steady upward trend of the market, we find it hovering at a very low ebb if not actually pointing downward. The reason for it very largely is the exorbitant tax which has been placed upon future trading, of 5 cents per $100 as against the original 1 cent per $100, an increase of 400 per cent. The result has been to decrease the amount of future trading more than one-half, with the result that this falling off in future trading is reflected in the prices received by the producers of this country.

I wish to say very frankly that when we began consideration of this question of future trading I was one Member of this House who had a very definite opinion that we ought to abolish all future trading.

I say to you now time has demonstrated to me that I knew little or nothing about future trading and its relation to commodity prices.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Indiana five additional minutes.

Mr. PURNELL. When we went fully into the consideration of future trading, I was one of the first Members to change front on this proposition. I became convinced that unless we can maintain a liquid market and preserve the hedge the people who produce the foodstuffs of this Nation will suffer.

I am not speaking to-day in behalf of speculators or gamblers on the grain exchange. I am talking in behalf of the producers of this country. [Applause.] I think I violate no confidence when I say the Secretary of Agriculture and the experts in the Department of Agriculture, who never asked for this 400 per cent increase in the first place, are with me 100 per cent in this effort to have this tax reduced from 5 cents per $100 down to 2 cents by amending section 726 of the revenue act of 1932. Looking toward that end, I have introduced H. R. 12886, which is now pending before the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I have information that this law is especially hard on the small men, the small traders. Is this correct?

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. In an attempt to get the big fellow they are hurting the little fellows?

Mr. PURNELL. It is hurting everybody. I will let somebody else speak for the grain people whom I mentioned. I do not undertake to speak for them, although they have the same rights as any other group and are entitled to equal justice. I am now speaking for millions of American farmers. May I say that the farm organizations of this country with whose representatives I have conferred are in hearty sympathy with this effort and, as a matter of fact, were largely instrumental in setting the machinery in motion which I hope will result in bringing about the passage of the amendment which I have proposed?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am pleased indeed to have this expression by the gentleman from Indiana, who knows more about agriculture, I think, or surely as much, as any other Member of the House.

I may say that I myself have introduced a bill to restore the tax which existed prior to the enactment of the revenue act of 1932, or 1 cent per $100 in value of produce sold for future delivery.

The 100 per cent increase from 1 cent to 2 cents would give us very little revenue at best, and I may say to the gentleman I think it is best that we should concentrate our efforts on restoring the law as it was before the new revenue act went into effect.

The truth is that the present tax of 5 cents per $100 of value is destroying trading on the grain exchanges. Other gentlemen may speak for the cotton exchanges, but so far as grain is concerned there is now practically no market where the farmers' products can be sold. These products must be sold upon a market which can take care of future deliveries, because grain can not be sold the moment it is ready for delivery. There must be a market for sale in advance of completed production and that market, like most other business, is necessarily to some extent of a speculative character.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman is entirely correct, and I wish to thank him for his observation.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I may say the testimony before the Agricultural Committee of the forward-looking people who appeared made me certain in my mind that this was an unjust tax and was going to work exactly the hardship that it is now working upon the people. As far as I am concerned, this situation should be remedied, and I think the gentlemen on this side [Democratic] are willing to go along. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman please bear in mind that the gentleman from New York is on the right side for the time being at least? [Laughter.] I do not know whether he will stay put or not.

Mr. PURNELL. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from New York is on my right as I stand here. Further than that I can not agree with my friend from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. HOPKINS. I was very much interested in what the gentleman had to say concerning the necessity of the futures market. Would it not be just as logical to prohibit the sale of hail insurance, fire insurance, or tornado insurance as to prohibit the use of the futures market? It acts as an insurance of the grain market.

Mr. PURNELL. It absolutely does; and unless we can maintain this insurance feature of the hedge it can not help but be reflected adversely in the prices the farmers receive.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Indiana five additional minutes.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, our farm people never asked for this legislation in the first place. Frankly, I do not now recall how it got in here; but it is here and in operation and has already demonstrated its death-dealing effect to farm prices.

Now, let me call your attention to these facts: Right now there is an upward trend of prices in Liverpool.

We have definite reports of black rust in Nebraska and Kansas.

Grasshoppers are running rampant in the Red River Valley. We have heard about grasshoppers before, but it is a serious matter and has a direct bearing upon the wheat crop and the price of wheat.

The first winter wheat is now being marketed in Minneapolis and the tests show a very low protein content. This fact, together with the others which I have suggested and certain world conditions which I do not have time to enlarge upon, should send the price of wheat upward. But the price has not gone up; and it has not gone up because future trading has been diminished by half.

Here is an opportunity to do something tangible for agriculture, and it is of such an emergency nature that it ought to be taken up for consideration at once and passed promptly.

I shall not go into this subject further at this time. My desire was to call it to your attention in the hope that I might make some little impression upon the Members, particularly the membership of the Ways and Means Committee. We have been groping around in the dark.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. BARTON. If I understood the gentleman a while ago, he indicated that this would be an insurance policy to prevent the price of grain from going down. Is that correct?

Mr. PURNELL. That is true, in a sense.

Mr. BARTON. Is it not also an insurance policy to keep grain from going up?

Mr. PURNELL. If you refer to future trading I will say it is a stimulation. I want to say this in conclusion: The first and most important thing to be done in our efforts to restore prosperity and bring this country back to normal is to put money into the pockets of the American farmers. The very minute we can restore in any appreciable degree the buying power of our farm population just that soon shall we begin to see a general return of prosperity throughout this country. It can not return before. Here is one place to start. I sincerely hope that all of you will talk and think seriously about this matter, and if you feel so disposed express your sentiments to the distinguished gentlemen who served on the Ways and Means Committee, who must first give us an opportunity to present this matter to the House.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I favor everything the gentleman has said. I know that in Peoria, where we have an exchange, things exist as the gentleman states them. What process will we have to go through to have this done immediately?

Mr. PURNELL. The first thing necessary will be for the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. COLLIER, of Mississippi, to call his committee together, have the committee take favorable action and set the necessary machinery in motion to amend the revenue act so as to reduce this tax from 5 cents to 2 cents, or even 1 cent.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman know what effect his suggestion and the suggestion made by the gentleman from Missouri would have upon the famous Budget?

Mr. PURNELL. I do not, but since the Budget is not yet in complete balance, I would rather see it a little farther out of balance than have our farm prices completely demoralized by reason of this unjust tax. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I desire to call the attention of the Members of the House to a situation that has developed in New York that primarily affects the administration of justice in the district courts and particularly in the District Court of the Southern District of New York. The district judges there have seen fit to disregard the members of the legal profession in New York in the appointment of receivers and attorneys for receivers and trustees in bankruptcy and equity receiverships. They have turned all of that patronage over to an impersonal entity, the Irving Trust Co., so that the Irving Trust Co., one of the largest banks in New York City, has now supplanted an honorable profession in the administration of bankruptcy cases and equity receiverships.

A few years ago there occurred some scandals in the city of New York concerning the appointment of receivers (and personally I believe the judges were just as much to blame as the incompetent and dishonest officials they may have appointed). Now, causing the pendulum to swing far in the other direction, those judges have surrendered their rights and appointed the Irving Trust Co. in all cases, as though honesty, integrity, and fair dealing had entirely departed from the legal profession and could reside only in this impersonal entity, the Irving Trust Co. This company they set up as a huge monopoly in all bankruptcy and equity receivership cases.

The legal profession was somewhat complacent in the beginning, but murmurs of discontent are now being heard on all sides. I believe a great scandal is brewing. I believe irregularities far worse than the ones these judges were supposed to correct are cropping up and will continue to crop up. It must be brought home to the judges that they have set up a veritable Frankenstein, with power to appoint, not only the receivers in bankruptcy and equity cases, but the appraisers, the custodians, the auctioneers, the trustees as well as the attorneys for the trustees and receivers.

There is no longer anything personal about these transactions. The trust company is usually anxious to complete the proceeding. There is nothing professional or personal in its work. The rights of the bankrupt and creditors mean nothing. The important thing is, How much can the trust company earn? The whole proceeding mush be washed up as quickly as possible. The conduct of the Irving Trust Co. in many cases, as is natural with corporations, borders on the ruthless. There is no sympathy for the bankrupt, no matter how honest he may be. He is cowed and coerced. The trust company will never take the time to effect settlements or reorganizations. If there is little or no money in the estate, the Irving Trust Co. refuses or neglects to investigate diligently or to follow up assets that the bankrupt frittered away or has fraudulently concealed. There is no motive to do the job right in many of the smaller cases, because there is no money in it for the trust company. Furthermore, there often arises conflict of interests. Since the trust company is receiver and trustee in all cases, it finds itself making claims against itself. A bankrupt estate has claims against another bankrupt estate. Thus the trust company claims against the trust company. Such a situation is intolerable. I have many communications from lawyers in New York City bearing out all these statements.

I venture the assertion that the Judiciary Committee of the House, of which I am a member, and which has now under consideration amendments to the bankruptcy act, will be compelled to reach the conclusion that the district judges in the southern district of New York have unwisely, improperly, and improvidently, as well as unlawfully, set up a monopoly in the Irving Trust Co. In the beginning I did not pay much attention to the complaints of my fellow lawyers in New York, but so sustained has been the criticism that I could no longer remain indifferent. Upon the basis of the facts disclosed to me I believe these judges deserve condign censure for their abject position in this matter. One of the judges explained to me that formerly they were importuned at their homes, upon the streets, and at public gatherings by those who sought to be appointed as receivers in bankruptcy cases, and that they now have great peace of mind because they are no longer bothered with these insistent demands for appointments. He pointed out that the judges are human; that they have their friends whom they would be glad to see earn fees; but that they felt they had a far superior duty to the commercial world than the giving of favors to friends and have therefore established the present system.

I have great respect for the opinion of this particular judge, but in his position in this connection he is utterly wrong. Most of the lawyers in New York pointed out that the bankruptcy statute was not enacted for the convenience of judges or their peace of mind. In fact, I replied to his statement that he should have been able to steel himself against such importunities of friends, and that he should have rendered himself impervious to the demands of those who wished to be appointed as lawyers, appraisers, custodians, auctioneers, or attorneys for trustees and receivers.

Furthermore, it is interesting to note that the bankruptcy statute, as it is now written, does not permit or countenance the action taken by these judges. It must be remembered that the present statute provides for creditor control over bankrupt estates. But under the existing system the creditors can not appoint their own trustees, even if they wished. They are practically coerced into acceptance of the Irving Trust Co. as trustees. This great mogul stands in the way of the creditors and says, "We will be appointed, and we will not tolerate anyone else being appointed."

The judges complained that they were tired of political patronage in the appointment of receivers, but note what has happened now. They have set up another kind of patronage—that of the Irving Trust Co. Unless a man can bring business to the Irving Trust Co. he can not be appointed trustee or receiver or as attorney for trustees and receivers of the Irving Trust Co. He must either bring to them trust business or encourage deposits to the trust company. That is but natural. Appointments of lawyers are not exclusively upon merit or efficiency. Already charges are made that lawyers of large depositors and friends of the trust company's officers are being favored.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman also point out that just as the gentleman and myself were about to proceed against this system by reason of the fact that the Irving Trust Co. was depositing with itself bankrupt estate funds, a rule was enacted by the Supreme Court, I believe, making this permissible? I doubt the legality of that action.

Mr. CELLER. I quite agree with the gentleman. These judges had no right to allow the funds of these bankrupt estates and these equity receiverships to be deposited in the very bank that is the equity and bankruptcy receiver. Suppose I were appointed a receiver in any kind of a proceeding, I would not be permitted to hold my own funds, yet that is the situation in New York; and I quite agree with my distinguished colleague from New York, who, incidentally, has a bill which will strike a blow at this very practice, because he sees eye to eye with me and with most of the members of our profession in New York City with reference to the situation that now prevails in that city.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman's committee intend to investigate conditions in New York, or has a report been made on such an investigation, or is it intended to include other sections of the country where some of these abuses may also prevail?

Mr. CELLER. I will say to my distinguished colleague from Illinois that our investigations of the bankruptcy situation throughout the Union have not been concluded. If the gentleman has any specific cases where there are similar discrepancies or scandals, we would be very happy to consider them.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. MILLARD. The presiding justice of the circuit court of appeals agrees with the gentleman's statement.

Mr. CELLER. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

One of the judges of the circuit court of appeals, Martin T. Manton, in the public press this morning, has this to say on the subject:

> All integrity, honesty, and understanding have not left the bar just because of the so-called bankruptcy scandal. Lawyers give to bankruptcy cases their individual, personal attention—their humane consideration. They are efficient and competent, and I believe can handle the exigencies of bankruptcy situations more satisfactorily than a banking corporation.

I heartily indorse what Judge Manton says in the public press this morning, and I am sure that all liberal-minded, forward-thinking men and women of this House will think likewise, and I shall do all in my power to prevent a continuance of the Irving Trust Co. as sole, monopolizing receiver in these cases in New York. [Applause.]

I am in receipt of some very interesting communications from lawyers, and I herewith submit extracts from these communications. The names of the lawyers will be furnished upon request. I do not see my way clear to publish the names of these attorneys for fear that reprisals may be visited upon them.

> 1. In the past few years of high finance we have learned that even the largest financial institutions had very little virtue, and that their doings caused losses to the public generally and greatly contributed to our economic breakdown. We know how ruthless and self-sufficient corporations become when they enjoy a monopoly. We also know that in the past in connection with railroads, public utilities, etc., receiverships were used for the purpose of obtaining control of valuable properties. The experience of the past dictates that corporations should not be appointed receivers or trustees.
> The government serves best that does good to the greatest number, with due regard for the welfare of all. Greatest efficiency, even if attainable, when it takes away a living from large numbers generally does much harm to a community. The Irving Trust Co. now enjoys a complete monopoly in bankruptcy receiverships and a favored position as trustee and in equity receiverships, with the tremendous patronage that goes with the same, to the exclusion of the general bar and other agencies. While lawyers are not permitted to solicit claims to elect a trustee, the referee, a judicial officer, under a local court rule is required to send out with his notice for the first meeting of creditors a printed blank of proof of debt and power of attorney to be executed by the creditor, authorizing the referee to vote for said trust company as trustee. The designation of the Irving Trust Co. originally as receiver was to meet a temporary condition, and the United States district judges tried to do the best they could at the time. However, the legal machinery of supervision is, or could be made, sufficient to prevent a recurrence of what happened and for which the bar generally was not to blame.
> There are entirely too many upright and competent laymen and lawyers who would execute their trust efficiently if appointed. Referring to lawyers, they are a very important social and economic factor in our community. In the southern district of New York there are approximately 19,000 lawyers, employing probably 20,000 office assistants, many of whom support dependents. Thousands of law offices are maintained at a probable total overhead expense of $35,000,000 or more annually, without taking into account the lawyer's net earnings and personal and family expenditures. If the latter were taken into account, we would probably have more than 75,000 persons in this district directly dependent for their living upon the earnings of the legal profession and spending for living purposes over $100,000,000 annually. The lawyers participate in and contribute to the community activities, and they also pay direct and indirect taxes. They, together with their assistants and immediate families, are sufficient in numbers to make up one of our fair-sized cities. The lawyers are, therefore, entitled to consideration, and their rights and privileges should not be curtailed, unless there is absolute public necessity for the same, which is not the case.
> 2. In our opinion, no corporation should be appointed as trustee, executor, or administrator, or in any other confidential relation. A corporation is just naturally unfit to perform the intimate service which such trust demands.
> In relation to the Irving Trust Co. of New York, our firm has had very considerable experience over the past year with the manner in which they administer bankrupt estates. The administration of each estate is left to some lawyer, how selected we do not know, who is permitted to operate largely in his own way without much accountability to anybody, is actually in a great many instances very arbitrary and in an extra legal manner, and in many instances is arrogant and anxious to display his power as backed up by a great banking institution.
> In one bankruptcy estate in 1931, as shown by a final determination when the matters came before the court, one of these lawyers arbitrarily used the power of 21 A of the bankruptcy act in an effort to harass and annoy people entirely outside the proceedings for the benefit of an alleged bankrupt in furtherance of his private schemes.
> Owing to the supposed power of the banking institution and the extraordinary honesty and integrity which bankers are supposed to possess above all the rest of us, our clients were put to many thousands of dollars of expense in the courts to protect themselves.
> We do not think the human beings who occupy swivel chairs in banks are entitled to any greater reputation for honesty and integrity than the members of the bar, and disagree with the implication that nobody but a bank can be trusted to act as a trustee in bankruptcy in the southern district of New York.
> 3. The referees in the southern district include a proxy vote for the Irving Trust Co. as trustee. But it was deemed unethical for a receiver to solicit the appointment of himself as a trustee. Evidently there is a double standard. The result, of course, is that a client, who is often entitled to rescind an entire transaction and recover back his merchandise or moneys, does not do so, because he no longer consults with his attorney and loses often great rights. Only a few weeks ago one of my clients lost $700 that way.
> Members of the bar are officers of the court. Violations of their duty are susceptible to grave, immediate, and summary punishment, including disbarment. Their character and fitness must be passed upon before admission to the bar. To secure creditors from any monetary losses, a sufficient bond is usually ordered by the appointing court. Why, then, should one small clique be appointed professional trustees?
> I certainly am in favor of rigid supervision by administrators and examiners, duly qualified, with the penalty imposed upon them for failure to adequately examine and report in bankruptcy estates. This method would be much superior to appointing professional trustees or giving all receiverships to the Irving Trust Co. Just as a matter of interest, I respectfully suggest that your committee check the time that the moneys collected from bankrupt estates remain dormant in the Irving Trust Co.'s account before a dividend is declared. It would also be advisable to check and see the number of real estate brokers used to effect sales of the real property of the bankrupt estates. I would also suggest that a checking be made of the brokers used to sell stocks, bonds, and merchandise of bankrupt estates handled by the Irving Trust Co., and check whether or not a small group of insiders are controlling the business. If they are, I would advise further investigation into the results of such actions.

4. I noticed with interest your statement with regard to the Irving Trust Co.'s seizure of all bankruptcy business in New York, and take this occasion to heartily indorse your stand. As was pointed out by Charles H. Hyde, Esq., in a speech before the Federal Bar Association in New York some time ago, the Federal district court judges in the southern district of New York are placing a premium on the attorneys representing the Irving Trust Co., thereby stating in effect that no other attorneys than those hired by the Irving Trust Co. are ethical.

5. I can not too strenuously express dissatisfaction with the proposed appointment of a certain New York trust company as exclusive receiver, as the same is abhorrent to legal and fundamental American principles. It is in effect substituting an inanimate corporate body not bound by legal ethics in the place of our fellow members of the bar. I wish to further characterize it as an eminent piece of favoritism. It also tends to breed a spirit of contempt for our profession. Not to say that it will deprive lawyers of a livelihood, I would point out in this regard that lawyers are a substantial part of this community; many thousands of persons are dependent upon the legal profession, in whole or in part, for their means of existence, such as employees of law offices, printers, and landowners. Such a law would be unfortunate and another severe blow to the already hard-pressed profession.

6. If we do not lead [in advocating reform] we lawyers will be swept aside by those who, goaded by the defects in the present act, may not be qualified to suggest progressive reforms.

We have a good example of that in the handling of the liquor problem. For years we temporized—we delayed—and instead of a temperance reform, the country got bone-dry prohibition, with the cure perhaps much worse than the evil.

Do we want the same thing to happen with reference to the bankruptcy practice? Isn't this what really happened in the southern district of New York? The evils became so bad, the need for reform so urgent, that the judges gave a virtual monopoly to the Irving Trust Co. in the receivership field.

This is a good illustration of a case where, in order to correct an evil, reform has gone too far. Mind you, the writer does not intend to criticize the administration of estates by the Irving Trust Co. He frankly believes that a good many of the evils have been eliminated by the businesslike way in which they have conducted the administration of estates. But it is a fair question for us to ask: Was it necessary to go that far? Suppose the judges in other Federal districts adopt the same procedure as was adopted in New York? This means that you would establish a monopoly of receiverships throughout the country in just a few institutions. Is this desirable or in accord with our whole competitive theory of life in this country?

If such a thing came to pass, would not the members of the bar be worse off, for then they would be dependent, more or less, upon the whim, or perhaps the favoritism of a few persons in charge of the bankruptcy department of those various corporate receivers?

These extracts are typical of the observations of most of the lawyers in New York. A real tempest of reproach against the Federal judges is brewing. Unless they backwater and rescind the order setting up this monopoly legislation will be enacted, tying their hands.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, it is an accepted postulate in governmental administration that the budget of a government must be balanced. No less true, I hold, is it necessary that the world's budget of administration expense must be balanced if there is to be world recovery.

At Lausanne for several days past the great powers of Europe have been in conference attempting to adjust to a reasonable, workable basis the obligation of payment of Germany for their loss of the World War conflict.

Immediately after the war the estimate of the burden that Germany was to assume for the loss of the war was fixed at $125,000,000,000. In June, 1920, the allied representatives fixed the loss at $64,000,000,000, or about one-half the first figure. In April, 1921, the reparations commission appointed under the treaty of Versailles fixed the amount that should be paid at $31,680,000,000. No attention was then given to the ability of Germany to pay.

Under this arrangement Germany was called upon to pay $476,000,000 in yearly annuities and 26 per cent of the value of her exports.

You remember the cataclysm that befell Germany in the years of 1921 and 1922. Her finances were wrecked completely. France, still being prompted by the military spirit of the war, made the futile mistake, as I view it, of invading the Ruhr to force Germany to pay something that she could not pay.

Things got to such an impasse that Secretary of State Hughes felt the need of intervention and called upon the great powers to have representatives appointed to try to bring about some arrangement whereby order might be established in Germany in place of the chaos that was causing or threatening to cause absolute ruin to the German Republic and the German people.

You will recall in those trying days for the German people how it was threatened with the spread of bolshevism, and if it had spread into Germany there was no telling whether the soviet revolutionary spirit might not spread still farther westward over all the governments of Europe. So a conference of the great powers was called, at which the two outstanding representatives of our Government were Mr. Charles G. Dawes and Mr. Owen D. Young.

That conference arrived at the so-called Dawes agreement. That agreement did not fix the total amount of reparations that was to be paid, but only provided that from the year 1925, $238,000,000 annuity should be paid by Germany up to 1928, and thereafter $595,000,000 annuity.

Well, that arrangement stabilized the currency for the time. Germany attempted to put its house in order, but it was found impossible under such terms to meet these burdensome obligations.

And so another conference was called. In January, 1929, J. Pierpont Morgan and Owen D. Young met in Paris in conference with French officials to try and fix the terms and the basis of payment of reparations by Germany to the allied powers.

In June of that year, after almost Herculean efforts of this great business financier and statesman, Owen D. Young, the powers fixed the total indebtedness that Germany should pay at $8,800,000,000. On the basis of that fixed determination Germany was able to float a loan of $190,500,000 to pay a part of the reparations.

More than that, there was such confidence of the world that the Young plan was workable, even though the former president of the Reichsbank, Mr. Hjalmar Schacht, refused to sign the agreement because he believed the terms were impossible of execution, the German Government was able to borrow between six and seven billions of foreign credit.

Now it is barely possible that if this industrial depression had not come upon not only the United States but the world, Germany might have been able to meet these conditions.

But a year ago—in June, 1931—conditions were so critical, not only in Germany but throughout the world, that President Hoover felt impelled to propose to all the interested governments a moratorium of all the reparation payments and interallied debts for one year.

France hesitated in agreeing to the terms as proposed by President Hoover and insisted on a modification of the terms, whereby delay ensued and the main psychological effect of the Hoover moratorium was lost. Nevertheless, on July 1, 1931, the moratorium went into effect. That deferred the payment of the amounts owing us during the year, totaling $269,000,000, which was to be paid over a period of the following years.

This past year, with all the industrial wreckage that has gone on, it became more and more apparent that at the end of the moratorium on July 1 of this year, Germany would not be in a position to pay the obligations as laid down by the Young plan.

So the great powers of Europe met at Lausanne, and this morning's paper carries the heartening message that France, Germany, Great Britain, Belgium, and Japan, recognizing that if we are going to have industrial revival in the world it is necessary first and foremost to settle for all time the reparations that Germany is to pay, and place them on a basis with a sum total fixed that Germany can pay. The amount is not the 8,000,000,000 marks that France went to the conference intending to insist upon, not the 4,000,000,000 marks that she would agree as a basis to accept, but 2,600,000,000 marks, equivalent to $618,800,000.

And so to-day an accord between Germany and France is about consummated, brought about through the Herculean efforts of Premier Ramsay MacDonald, with Germany in a position to know a definitely fixed amount whereby she can from this time forward look to the future, and be able to pay $618,800,000 and wipe out for all time the reparation payments.

I claim that if to-day, as it is hoped and expected, the German representative, Lieutenant Colonel von Papen, and the French Premier, Edouard Herriot, come to an accord, as Ramsay MacDonald is urging them to do, you will see that July 9, which is the date abroad to-day, will be a cardinal date in the world's industrial calendar for the revival not only of European industry but of American industry, and industry throughout the world. I have taken the position, after my study of this question during these years since the war, that there could be no industrial revival in America unless conditions were placed upon a sane basis in Europe. The policy of self-containment, that America can prosper when the world without is depressed and is in the throes of depression, is counter to all economic history.

The British, recognizing the need of curtailment of government expenditures, have virtually accepted and gone one step farther than the proposal of President Hoover that armaments shall be reduced one-third. According to this morning's paper, Stanley Baldwin, Deputy Premier of Great Britain, in the absence of Ramsay MacDonald, made a speech in the House of Commons yesterday wherein he said Britain favored not only a reduction of one-third of tonnage but one-third of gun capacity of her naval vessels. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we are hopeful that after these weeks and weeks of virtually little accomplishment at Geneva as to arms limitation, something may yet come out of that conference whereby the governments of the world will be relieved of this tremendous burden of armament, which is costing the people of America hundreds of millions of dollars annually, even to the extent that our war cost to-day is nearly 70 per cent of the entire cost of running the Government. The people in these industrial depressions, when they are feeling the pinch of income and other burdensome taxes, are calling aloud to their representatives in Washington to cut down these unnecessary, extravagant expenditures for war armament. It is a heartening cry, indeed, that comes from across the ocean that Great Britain joins hands with America to try to relieve not only their respective countries of the burdens of armament, but all the countries incidentally as well.

The only hitch in the negotiations going on between Germany and France over the economic accord is a demand on the part of Germany for a change in article 231 of the Versailles treaty, which places the entire guilt of the war upon Germany. Germany claims that it should be modified and rescinded.

Mr. Chairman, I served in this body during the war. I was one of 50 who cast their votes against war. I do not intend at this moment to review that tragic April 6, when President Wilson from that rostrum read his famous war message, nor the night following, when Claude Kitchin, the great leader of the Democratic majority, read his 2-minute speech in which he said that he regretted that he could not follow his President on this issue of our entering the war; but during that war Congress, busy as I was as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, delegated by the chairman of the committee, Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, who was chairman up to January 1, 1918, and after his resignation by his successor, Mr. Swagar Sherley, to watch every piece of legislation on this floor, because they were so busy preparing the Budget of billions and billions of dollars to carry the war to a successful conclusion, I believed then that the nation primarily at fault as causing the war was Austria and the stubbornness of Emperor Francis Joseph, and that next to Austria so far as responsibility for the war is concerned was Russia, whose secretary of state, Count Zarnoff, had declined as the records show, for 18 hours to communicate a personal letter that the Kaiser had sent to his cousin, the Czar of Russia, to stay mobilization, so that the threatened impending conflict might be averted; and my reading of official documents during the interim of Congress and books by Count Montzelaf and by Earl Grey, and others I had an opportunity to get hold of, confirmed that original opinion I had formed while the conflagration was raging abroad, that Austria was primarily at fault, and that secondarily it was Russia with the covert aid of the secretary of state, Count Zarnoff, and that Germany was not responsible for the war; that she, of course, had as her ally Austria under the treaty of alliance, and that when Russia invaded Austria she was obliged to come to her defense.

I recall a wonderful meeting in which members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House and of the Senate met at Miss Mabel Boardman's house one Sunday afternoon, when a representative of the Rockefeller Institute was present, who stated at that time—and we were not then in the war, it was 1917; and who was seeking to have our Government appropriate $500,000,000 to aid the people of Russia—that the German Emperor had held back for five days, against the will of the military staff, the German Army under orders to proceed through Belgium, and that those five days were proven later to be the fatal days which prevented Germany reaching Paris in her drive to conquer France.

But I am here to-day happy as an American representative that the war hate which dominated France and was supported by British statesmen following the war, has abated, and that to-day France places her industrial revival ahead of her hate of Germany, and that they are coming to a reasonable accord, so that instead of $125,000,000,000 being exacted as the war cost that Germany was to pay they are willing to accept 2,600,000,000 marks, the equivalent of $618,800,000. Mr. Chairman, if this accord is an accomplished fact, as I hope and pray, then it is my expectant hope and wish to see America, great international America, rebound also in prosperity, under the spell of the resumption of activity through Europe by reason of this safe, sensible, and reasonable accord between Germany and France. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to announce to the committee that when the committee rises I shall ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. The Senate has determined not to take up the relief bill to-day, and that means that nothing can be done in the House to-morrow.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Unless the gentleman, who is majority leader of the House, will make some agreement with us who desire to get a vote on the beer bill, we shall object to any unanimous-consent request along that line.

Mr. RAINEY. If the gentleman objects, that is his privilege, and if the gentleman does object, then I will state that no business will be transacted to-morrow except the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BRITTEN. We will determine upon that to-morrow.

Mr. RAINEY. Very well, but we will see that nothing else happens.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Why can we not take up this War Department appropriation bill? These enlisted men have to be paid when pay day comes around. The workers on flood-control work and rivers and harbors must be paid.

Mr. RAINEY. That bill is still in conference, and I am not one of the conferees.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is the majority leader, however.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Much has been said about agricultural conditions. The gentleman from Indiana this morning made a very important statement concerning them. I think, however, that many of the Members do not realize what the exact condition is in many parts of the western agricultural area. For example, on day before yesterday I went over to the restaurant and I paid 15 cents for an ear of corn, and out in the district which I represent in the State of Iowa our farmers get only 15 cents for an entire bushel of corn.

When I was at home a little more than three weeks ago the farmers were contracting their oats, this year's oats, and they could get only 8 cents a bushel. It will not pay to harvest them, except possibly for hay. If you go down to the restaurant here, you would pay 20 or 25 cents for a dish of oatmeal. So it goes.

Not long since a constituent who was here in the gallery told me about selling his ewes in Omaha for 10 cents. I do not mean 10 cents a pound. I do not mean 10 cents a hundred pounds. I mean 10 cents per ewe. That is all he got for them net. If you go to a restaurant in this city, they will charge you $1.10 for a couple of little lamb chops.

I could continue these illustrations, but I only have five minutes, and I want to say a few other things. I want you to know that it will not cost the people of the United States who are not in the agricultural area a single penny if they see that justice is done to the farmers. They will not be charged any more for their food or foodstuffs.

There came to me yesterday and to-day some very alarming reports. The largest city in my district is a city of about 22,000 people. On the 2d day of July, under a proclamation issued by the mayor of the town, all business places there were closed in order that the two banks might go out and get what they call waivers, whereby the depositors waive the right to withdraw their accounts for three years at 3 per cent. Not only did it apply to the banks but it applied to the stores, so that the stores are closed in that city to-day. For example, it is impossible to buy a shirt. The restaurants are open only a part of the time. Filling stations are open a part of the time during the day.

Now, that same thing spread to two adjoining counties, and at the present time there is a 10-day moratorium or holiday in three of the counties of my district. In my own county the same thing happened three weeks ago, except that the holiday was for three days only. They went out and got what they called pledges of confidence in the bank, being mere waivers, whereby the depositors declared they had confidence in the bank and they would wait for three years for it to pay deposits.

The point I want to make to-day is that these conditions must not be allowed to continue. There must be some way of remedying this situation. It will soon be too late. Farmers are being evicted right and left. Foreclosures are increasing. It is appalling and tragic. The remedy depends upon our money conditions. I think we need a reflation of the currency and of the purchasing value of commodities. [Applause.] I think that is requisite to our industrial life, not only amongst the farmers but amongst all the people of this country. Relief must come quickly.

I made some statements recently in a newspaper article concerning reflation in connection with a discussion of the soldiers' bonus, and as my time is about to expire I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks on that question by inserting that article in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

JULY 6, 1932.

EDITOR GLOBE GAZETTE,
Mason City, Iowa.

DEAR SIR: My attention has just been called to the editorial which recently appeared in your paper concerning the vote on the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill. With overzealous confidence you venture a guess that it is doubtful whether in the list of 209 Congressmen who voted for the bill there could be found "two dozen who had any other major consideration than political effect." You then say that you will give me space to tell my reasons for voting in favor of this bill. This invitation was also tendered to Congressman HAUGEN. I understand he has already availed himself of this privilege, and I now desire to do likewise.

Let me first reaffirm the statements which Congressman HAUGEN made in your columns. He gave the reasons for paying these veterans at this time from a standpoint of adjusting their compensations so that they would be paid a fraction of what noncombatants were paid during the war, and because of their services to the country and of the debt which rich and poor alike owe them because of patriotism and public policy. I join in these sentiments, but will make no further reference to them, inasmuch as he presented the matter so forcefully that I could not hope to equal him.

The bill did not involve any new or additional appropriation or even any appropriation at all. The obligation to these soldiers had already been acknowledged and had been outstanding for years. Everybody agreed that it will have to be paid some time—presumably in 1945. The soldiers already had certificates issued to them which acknowledge the debt and promise payment. The bill did not require the appropriation of one penny. The plan was to have the ex-service men surrender the $2,200,000,000 of adjusted-compensation certificates already owned by them, and then have the Government issue bonds, due, say, in 20 years, for this amount. With these Government bonds as security and as a basis, Treasury notes were to be issued in an equal amount. The bonds were to be deposited with the Federal reserve system and were not to be sold unless this became necessary at some future time. The Treasury notes were to be given to the ex-service men in exchange for their adjusted-service certificates already outstanding and in payment of the debt we owe them. This would not create a new obligation but simply change the form of an existing one. It would convert a noncirculating Government obligation into a circulating Government obligation. A noncirculating Government obligation does not affect the price level, but when we increase the circulating obligation we cause an increase of commodity-price level. Surely such an objective is highly desirable at this time. Credit facilities have been contracted and reduced to such a point that there is a comparatively small percentage of business being done at this time by the circulation of checks, bills, and drafts. Money is in hiding. Bank deposits are at a low ebb, and banks have failed in many places. There is a scarcity of circulating media. While the Treasury has put out a moderate amount of currency, nevertheless vast amounts of it are in hiding and are not circulating at all. There has been a contraction of the circulation, both in regard to money and in regard to checks, notes, drafts, acceptances, and other agencies used in our business exchanges.

The result of all this is that economic conditions, especially in agricultural communities, are at the lowest ebb. The prices of many farm products are lower than they have been for generations. It is said that wheat was lower recently than since those ancient days when the Virginia colonists founded the first permanent English colony at Jamestown. Many prices are comparable only to those current shortly after the Pilgrim Fathers landed on the stern and rock-bound coast of Massachusetts. In several counties in Iowa practically one farmer out of every seven has had his land sold by the sheriff at the front door of the courthouse. The other six have been able to keep only one jump ahead of the sheriff, but they are constantly losing in the race, so that they all may soon expect to be evicted. In my district eggs are selling for 7 cents a dozen. We are offered about 8 cents a bushel for the new crop of oats. Ewes brought a net of 10 cents each at Omaha recently. Hogs, although now on the upturn, are at ruinous prices. Surely it does not take any argument at this point to show that agricultural conditions are tragic. While I do not go into this argument, nevertheless my thesis fails unless I am right in claiming that conditions surrounding agriculture are cruel and even tragic. There must be found some method for restoring prices for farm commodities. There must be found some means for getting more money into the country before we can hope to pay our debts.

My vote was based on my conviction that the expansion of currency and of circulating mediums for facilitating exchange was the only remaining means available to this Congress by which the Federal Government might aid in overcoming such depression and in restoring normal business relations throughout the country.

The measure would have put large sums of money out into the country, and everyone would have been greatly benefited thereby. For example, $725,272.60 would have gone into Cerro Gordo County alone and would have been spent there for commodities or for investments. This is about three-quarters of a million dollars to go into your own county. Other Iowa counties would have received sums in about the proportion of their population as compared with your county.

In my judgment, this money would have helped measurably to restore prices for farm commodities. It would have increased the business of your merchants. It would have enabled your people to pay some of their debts. And people are not going to start buying from your storekeepers in large quantities while they are miserably in debt. This money would have restored values generally. At least, I think it would have tended to do all of these things.

This money would not, as has been claimed, have been mere "printing-press" money. As was pointed out in the debate, it would have had behind it gold reserves and Government bonds very similar to all the other issues of our currency. For example, vast amounts of national-bank currency are now circulating, and these have no better security than was contemplated by the soldiers' adjusted compensation act. But no one doubts the safety of such national-bank currency. I can not extend the argument at this point in this very brief statement, except to say that this money would have been sound and safe and worth a hundred cents on the dollar. It would not have been mere fiat money in the sense and within the meaning of those who argued against the bill, any more than much money now outstanding may be characterized as fiat.

The total amount going to our State would have been $46,577,200.15. Iowa would have received about 2 per cent of the entire distribution. On the other hand, Iowa pays much less than 1 per cent of Federal taxation. One authority says that it is only fifty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent, but I do not think this takes into consideration some items which should be considered. It is plain, therefore, that Iowa would have gotten much more than $2 for every $1 that it would have cost us. Even if interest were to be paid upon the bonds (which was not probable), nevertheless it would have been very good business for us in Iowa, looking at it from a merely selfish standpoint.

These bonds were not to draw interest until they were sold by the Federal Reserve Board. The original Owen bill provided that they could not be sold unless the amount of currency outstanding became so large that it was necessary to sell them in order to contract and draw in such currency. This provision made the bill subject to a point of order so it was changed to read that such board could sell such portions of such bonds as it might from time to time desire.

Your readers will understand that the board contracts or expands the currency by open-market transactions. If it wants to contract currency, it sells bonds and other securities and thereby gathers in currency from the country and contracts it. On the other hand, if it wants to expand the currency, it starts buying Government bonds and other securities. It pays for such purchases by issuing Federal reserve notes, and this puts money out into the country and increases the amount of currency in circulation.

Right here a conflict of opinion existed. The followers of the bonus bill claimed that it would never be necessary to sell any of the bonds and that consequently the payment of adjusted compensation would not cost the Government anything, because the Government already owed the debt and the payment of it at this time in the manner indicated would not have been an expense even for interest. There was much argument on this question. But it seemed certain that if such sales were ever made, it would be for the salutary purpose of drawing more money out of circulation after the time should have come that there would be too much of it in circulation. It is hard to conceive of such a time. If the bonds were not sold, then the bonus payment would cost nothing by way of interest, and so it would not entail any additional expense. It certainly is not a new obligation. If the bonds were negotiated before 1945, then there would have been some additional expense to the Treasury. If they were not negotiated, then there would not be any additional expense.

Even though some sales of bonds were found to be necessary in the future and attendant interest payments should be required, nevertheless such interest payments would be offset and compensated for by sinking-fund payments which are now required to be raised annually in order to create a fund to pay adjusted-service certificates already outstanding. It is stated that this sinking-fund payment amounts to about $112,000,000 per year, and it is a very important item in making up the annual budgets. No such sinking fund would have been required if the bonus bill had become a law. The sum last named would pay interest at 4 per cent on $2,800,000,000, and this is more than was required by the bonus measure.

I maintain that the dollar is too high priced, and that it takes altogether too much of the labor and produce of the farmer in order that he may be able to buy a dollar or to pay a dollar's worth of his debts. We are in the closing days of this session of Congress. We have all along talked about restoring the parity of commodity prices. We have all along pleaded for a dollar which would enable farmers to pay their debts and to get at least a considerable portion of cost price for their commodities. The real intrinsic value of commodities has not fallen, but the purchasing power of money has gone high. Amos, one of the lesser prophets, was a farmer and sheep herder about eight centuries before Christ. He cried out against iniquities which are similar to those which now exist, and he condemned those who had made the ephah (which was a dry measure about the size of a bushel) small and the shekel great. The bushel should not be too small nor the dollar too great. Each should be balanced equitably and fairly. We should not be "debushelized." The value of the bushel should not be so small as to cause agricultural bankruptcy. The value of the dollar should not be so great as to prevent payment of debts on an equitable basis as measured in labor and commodities.

With these things in mind and with a very positive realization of what had been done or what had omitted to be done by this Congress, we came to a vote upon the bonus bill. We had supported such measures as the Goldsborough bill which was indorsed by all of the great farm organizations, by leading economists, and by men in public life generally. It was considered safe and substantial. It passed the House by a vote of 289 to 60, but a flank attack was made upon it in the Senate whereby it was proposed to allow certain favored financial institutions to issue and emit nearly $1,000,000,000 in currency on the basis of Government bonds already owned by them. In this manner the owners would have received interest on the bonds and also interest on the currency which it was proposed to allow them to issue. This attack was a mere subterfuge. And the sponsor of this bill is reported in the press to have said that he did not believe in the plan but that he had proposed it in order to stop the Goldsborough bill. That bill was dead for this session at least.

We had also had before us various farm relief bills. Some of these involved the equalization fee. Some of them proposed the debenture plan and some of them would have put into effect an allotment plan, while still another would have combined all of these plans and would have allowed the Farm Board to use one or the other or any combination of them so that it could put into effect one plan with reference to a certain commodity and another plan with reference to a second commodity and still a third plan with reference to a third commodity. But at the time of the bonus vote it was known that all of these measures had no chance to pass Congress at this session.

Indeed there was nothing remaining before us which looked forward toward the restoration of currency except the bonus bill itself. Under the dreadful and pathetic conditions surrounding agriculture there was no help or hope to be expected at this session from any other proposed legislation. It was this bill or nothing. Leading economists assured us that the basis for this soldiers'-bonus issue was as sound and as well protected as many other kinds of money now current. It had every support that other currency had in gold reserves and in Government obligations.

Professor Fisher, the celebrated economist from Yale University, personally was against the measure. But notwithstanding this, and as an expert economist, he testified at the time of the hearings before the committee that the plan was perfectly sound in money mechanics. He said:

"But this method proposed by Senator Owen—and I understand it is practically the same as Senator THOMAS'S bill—is that the Government should issue bonds to the Federal reserve banks, in return for which the Government would get Federal reserve notes, and then they would give these Federal reserve notes to the soldiers or use them for expenses for any other purpose. It is a perfectly sound method."

On the last day of March this year we had a total outstanding currency of all kinds of about $5,400,000,000. Our total gold reserve held by the Treasury and the Federal reserve bank was $3,549,694,087. The currency outstanding in excess of the total gold reserves was only $1,864,391,298. Of this last-named amount a large portion had behind it only the promise of the Government to pay. National bank notes are on a parity with gold coin by virtue of the gold standard act and no one questions their value as a medium for exchange. Yet on the last day of March, this year, there were nearly $700,000,000 in currency of this character outstanding and the only reserve behind it was United States bonds and a little less than $30,000,000 in lawful money.

It must be remembered, however, that only about two and a half billions of our currency is circulating. Doctor Goldenweiser, Director of Research and Statistics of the Federal Reserve Board, testified concerning this $5,400,000,000 of currency outstanding, and said there were about $750,000,000 kept in the banks, about $1,750,000,000 hoarded, about $100,000,000 destroyed, and about $300,000,000 that was abroad; so that the active money in circulation was something like $2,500,000,000 only. This is much less than our needs require. There is a congestion of money and a paralysis of circulation and consequently a lack of means to carry on the normal volume of business. An accepted formula is that the gold reserves need equal only 40 per cent of the outstanding currency. On this basis the amount of currency required by the adjusted compensation act could be floated without danger and the currency would have behind it 40 per cent of gold as well as 100 per cent of Government bonds.

This Congress was about to adjourn. A Member from Iowa was fully justified in voting for the bill because of the reasons herein suggested, being:

(a) It was the only means left us whereby we could move toward restoring the dollar to equity.

(b) It was the only means remaining before us which would have increased the amount of currency in circulation in any substantial amount—a thing that is sorely needed.

(c) It was the only means open whereby we could have restored purchasing power to country commodities.

(d) It presented an opportunity to pay an existing obligation in such a way as to distribute the proceeds among all sections of the country equitably without first passing it into the hands of large financial institutions and allowing them to draw interest both upon the bonds and also upon the currency issue for which the bonds were pledged.

(e) It was not a new obligation, but simply a payment of one already incurred and outstanding and recognized by the Government.

(f) It was good business for Iowa, looking at it from a mere selfish standpoint, and put money into Iowa instead of taking it away from there.

(g) Suffering exists among these men, and it is claimed that one-third of them needed this help right now. Payment to them should not be delayed.

(h) Equities were with the soldiers as shown in your columns by Congressman HAUGEN.

(i) An emergency exists and emergent remedies are justified, especially when none other are available.

The bonus legislation was in payment of a debt and went on a different basis than an appropriation for flood control or harbor improvement or post-office building or bridge building or like projects. It is entirely different than the so-called "pork-barrel" bill, which was to be paid by a direct tax upon gasoline. Iowa consumes almost 3 per cent of all gasoline consumed in continental United States, although we have only about 2 per cent of the population and less than seventy-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the taxable income. Under the "pork-barrel" bill we were to build useless and expensive buildings and were to contract new and additional and huge debts and we were not getting our full share of the pork, although we were paying about three times our share of the total expenditures. Even if it be agreed that we can not squander ourselves into prosperity, nevertheless we ought to arrange to pay outstanding obligations. The two things are very different.

No legislation has been passed here which directly helps agriculture. Bills have been passed which have rescued railways and insurance companies and banks, including Federal farm-loan banks, from great embarrassments. I supported such relief bills. It is now claimed by some, however, that very little good has been done to the country banks by their passage. While the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loaned money to the country banks, nevertheless much of this money went to the metropolitan banks to pay what the country bank owed them. The effect of much of it was that the country bank simply changed the name of its creditor from the city bank to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Even this was helpful. Some of this money went to pay depositors, of course, but there is as yet no real or adequate relief for farmers.

We put $125,000,000 into the hands of the Federal Farm Loan Board, but these millions have acted more generally to support the price of the bonds of this system, thereby helping the bondholders and not the farmer. The farmer is not permitted to buy these bonds and present them in payment of any mortgage that he might be owing to the Federal land bank. On the contrary, the Federal land bank can foreclose its farm mortgage, evict the farmer, sell the land, and with the proceeds go into the market and buy its own bonds for a fraction of their face value, thereby making large profits. Indeed, some men acquainted with the Federal joint stock land-bank system have stated that this is one way by which such banks can maintain their solvency. The Hare bill, which I have tried to help, would have permitted the farmer to buy such bonds at current prices, much below par, and present them at face value in payment of his mortgage. This bill can not pass at this session. Furthermore, there is doubt as to its legality.

Few persons, if any, doubt that a reasonable reinflation or expansion of currency and credit facilities is desirable. Most people demand this as an absolute necessity and as a means by which we may hope to recover from financial debacle. All of the great farm organizations have asked for an honest dollar and one which will enable farmers to pay their debts and get at least as much as cost for their production. No measure will bring them that honest dollar quicker and surer than this method. This bill would have paid money into the various counties of my own congressional district in the following amounts: Boone County, $551,758.35; Calhoun County, $331,854.25; Carroll County, $420,845.10; Crawford County, $396,377.80; Emmet County, $242,335.60; Greene County, $311,552.80; Hamilton County, $395,435.30; Hancock County, $279,017.70; Humboldt County, $248,857.70; Kossuth County, $479,770.20; Palo Alto County, $290,252.30; Pocahontas County, $295,699.95; Webster County, $762,011.25; Winnebago County, $247,745.55.

And this money would have been spent in such a way as to quicken industry and revive business. A survey made last year by the Veterans' Bureau discloses that the first payment of bonus money under the loan bill was used in legitimate channels except a very small proportion, shown to be less than 7 per cent.

I can not object to criticism of my conclusions or of my votes when based on economic grounds, as I realize that there must be a very great divergence of opinion upon such questions. I can not hope that my friends will always agree with me. But any criticism of my vote based upon political expediency is not warranted. Congressman HAUGEN'S vote on this bill was right. So was mine.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I am in most thorough accord with what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] has just stated with reference to the farming situation throughout the country, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record along that line and to include a letter written by me to a constitutent of mine.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, does that letter written to a constituent explain how the farm situation will be helped after the gentleman from Georgia votes for beer and to modify the Volstead Act?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. It does not deal with the beer proposition. It does deal with farm relief and taxation.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman believe the farmers will be helped after the gentleman and the rest of his Democratic colleagues at some future time in the next few years change the Volstead Act?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I believe the farmers will be helped when we elect a Democratic President and carry into effect the benign provisions of our platform.

Mr. SCHAFER. Are you going to carry out the platform?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. The Democrats are pledged to do so as fully as the Republicans are pledged to carry theirs into effect.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is going to vote several years from now for modification of the Volstead law?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. The gentleman from Wisconsin is now entering the field of prophecy.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I know of no reason why I should not vote to amend the Volstead Act, if such course should become necessary. With my own right hand I wrote a small though very important part of that act. So far as I know I am the only Member of Congress to write a vitally important part of the Volstead Act and receive congratulations of both the wet and dry forces for writing and securing the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, on the 19th day of July, 1919, I offered and secured the adoption of an amendment to the Volstead Prohibition Act to protect all innocent owners and lien holders against improper forfeiture of their cars where intoxicants were being illegally transported in such car. It is interesting to note that prior to the adoption of my amendment neither the Federal statutes nor the laws of any of the States, so far as I am advised, had any provision affording the protection to innocent people provided by the Lankford lien amendment to the national prohibition act.

In order to show the opinion of my amendment entertained by Mr. Gard, of Ohio, one of the ablest lawyers in the House when my amendment was adopted, I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, page 2903, as follows:

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, first, that I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] is the most lucid amendment and expressed in the best legal phrasing of any amendment offered during the consideration of this bill. [Applause.] It should be adopted because it stands for justice, and stands for the right of a man having an honest interest in property to assert that lien in a court of competent jurisdiction wherever such property may be.

I wish also to quote from the decision of Justice Stone of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Richbourg Motor Co., intervenor, petitioner, against United States, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Seventy-first Congress, second session, pages 11404, 11405, and 11406, where Justice Stone, after mentioning the carefully chosen language of the amendment, said:

The conclusion we reach is not without support in the legislative history of section 26. The clause protecting the interests of innocent lienors was added by amendment in the House of Representatives to H. R. 6810, which became the national prohibition act. The sponsor for the amendment pointed out that the procedure prescribed by the section as originally drawn protected the interests of the innocent owner and stated that the amendment was designed to save from forfeiture the interests of innocent lienors and innocent owners alike. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 66th Cong., 1st sess. vol. 58, pt. 3, p. 2902, July 19, 1919.)

Having said this much about this amendment I wish to submit the letter referred to by me when I first rose which also contains a reference to this amendment. This letter, leaving off the name of the addressee, is as follows:

MY DEAR FRIEND: Answering your last inquiry first let me say that while I have a preference in the senatorial and gubernatorial races in my State, in fairness to them and my friends I can not afford to take any stand for either candidate except to vote.

As to my preference for State commissioner of agriculture I will say I do not wish to take sides in this contest except I quote with approval what the Valdosta Times recently said of my lifelong friend, Hon. W. W. Webb, of Hahira, as follows:

"The race for commissioner of agriculture is expected to be warmly contested, and there are several strong candidates. The Times believes, however, that Hon. W. W. Webb, of Hahira, a pioneer in developing better markets for Georgia farmers and a practical agriculturist himself, is the outstanding man in the field.

"Mr. Webb has the interest of the farmers at heart. He is sound and honest. He would serve the people well."

As disclosed by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I have on the floor of Congress on several former occasions mentioned the splendid qualifications of Mr. W. W. Webb, of Hahira, and called special attention to the splendid unselfish service he is rendering the agricultural interests. At personal sacrifice he has faithfully worked for the farmer all these years. No one has been more loyal to the farmer than Mr. Webb.

I feel that no one can blame me for being interested in the race for State treasurer. Hon. George W. Lankford, of Lyons, Ga., a candidate for that office, is my brother, and except for his splendid assistance I would never have been elected to Congress. Hon.

George W. Lankford, while State senator, drew and secured the adoption of a proposed amendment to the State constitution providing:

"The ad valorem tax for State purposes on all classes of property shall not exceed 4 mills for the first year an income tax is collected, and shall not exceed 3 mills for the second year an income tax is collected, and shall not exceed 2 mills for any subsequent year thereafter that an income tax is collected, except that the State's right to levy ad valorem tax for the purpose of paying the interest and principal of the present outstanding, recognized, valid, and legal bonded indebtedness of the State shall not be hereby abridged."

If this amendment had been ratified by the people of Georgia, their property tax would now have been less than half what it is. This is the very relief our people need.

This amendment did not become part of the State constitution because an aggressive fight was waged against it by those who want large and sometimes unnecessary appropriations to be made. These beneficiaries of large appropriations did not want the ad valorem or property taxes reduced for fear their pet appropriations might be reduced. This amendment being mentioned by the newspapers as the Lankford amendment caused some of my friends to ask me if I was the author of the proposal. I may say that while the authorship belongs to my brother, still I favored the ratification of the amendment. Brother George W. Lankford and I are in thorough accord on the idea that ad valorem or property taxes should be greatly reduced, if not done away with, and that as income taxes, sales taxes, and so forth, are put into force, property taxes should be accordingly reduced.

If the amendment of George W. Lankford had gone into effect, the people would now be far advanced on the road to real tax relief. The same fight made by George W. Lankford in the Georgia Legislature is being waged by me in Congress.

Your next question is easily answered. I want to be reelected to Congress on my record and on the proposals for which I am working.

After years of hard study, I believe the Lankford farm-relief plan is the very best yet suggested. I would like for anyone to suggest a better one. I would gladly help put it into effect. I have unbounded faith in my plan to reduce taxes, to stop the orgy of mortgage foreclosures, to help home owners, and relieve the present financial depression. I shall discuss all these matters many, many times in every county in my district this summer and want the good people of my district to hear me. I want to meet them again face to face and have a heart-to-heart talk about these matters that mean the very life of us all and of our Nation. I repeat, I want every man, woman, and child to hear me at least once this summer.

I shall discuss real plans for real relief for which I have fought, am now fighting, and shall continue to fight as long as God gives me life. I am determined every speech and every word thereof shall be clean, high class, and of such a nature as to be heard by and be truly beneficial to all, including our innocent children. Let us make laws for the children and all else will be well. In these awful trying times and through all our activities of every nature, everywhere, may the children lead us to act and live for them. Unless we can save our children and give them a chance this Nation will not long endure.

You ask me to name any legislation of value to the whole Nation that was passed solely by my efforts. This is impossible, since over 500 Members of the House and Senate, either directly or indirectly, take part in every measure that passes. The main thing we do in a legislative way is be on the right side and do our best.

Among the thousands of legislative proposals I have fought for and the hundreds of bills and amendments I have either offered or helped others to propose and sponsor, I remember two that passed of which I was the author, that to my mind are as important as any amendments to be adopted since I came to Congress. One is the Lankford lien amendment to the Volstead Prohibition Act protecting all liens of innocent people on automobiles or other carrier vehicles, aiding those who sell cars, providing safer buying and selling conditions, and enabling the average citizen to buy cars for less money on more satisfactory terms. Many of the States of the Union later used the exact language of the Lankford amendment in their prohibition enforcement acts. Some newspapers a year or two ago stated that many hundreds of millions of dollars had been saved by innocent people by my amendment; that this money so saved was then large enough to have paid my salary as a Member of Congress from the birth of Christ to the present time; and that the interest on it is large enough to pay my salary in the future forever.

Another important amendment bearing my name as author is that to the old War Finance Corporation act making available for discount by that corporation notes given by the farmers of the country to supply men or other people for farm purposes. This amendment helped every farmer who needed credit, every person who extended credit to the farmers and the banks of the whole Nation. To my mind, this amendment had more real farm relief, little-business-man relief, and small-bank relief than all numerous proposals considered and passed here since last December. The benefits of the War Finance Corporation act as broadened by the Lankford amendment are as far above the benefits to the common people under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act as the heavens are above the earth.

Of course, at this time I can not discuss my whole record in Congress. This would require the writing of a book. I have not the time to do this at present. I will discuss three or four more measures I have either helped enact into law or very much hope to help bring about in the near future.

Within the last month two of my measures have been written into law—one to furnish 500,000 bales of cotton for use by the Red Cross for the use of the suffering people of our country and the other to furnish transportation back home for the World War veterans who are now in Washington. To my mind, the cloud-capped mountain peak in my service here, though, is my contract plan of farm relief which is now receiving recognition by so many and which I believe will be enacted into law at next Congress, since the principle of my plan is approved by the Democratic nominee for President and is in the platform of the Democratic Party, which undoubtedly will be in full power after March 4 of next year.

From the time Adam and Eve were driven out of the Garden of Eden to the present the farmer has been the burden bearer of all peoples and has never received just compensation for his services. The fight to give him a square deal has been designated the battle for farm relief. This battle has never ended; it has never been won. I am hoping this may be done in the near future.

Another important fight, in so far as my district is concerned, though not so long a fight, is the proposed canal across south Georgia and north Florida. The first and only real survey of this canal was made when I was a small baby. It is now my great desire to actually pass the measure that will cause the immediate construction of this canal across my district.

The actual survey of two routes are now to be made. One for a ship canal, which will probably be across Florida at Jacksonville, and one for barge purposes, which, I am sure, will be across my district.

I was truly glad when the order was issued for a survey of a route for barge purposes separate and independent of the route selected for the proposed ship canal. I appreciate to the fullest extent a letter in this connection which I received from Mr. Hollins N. Randolph, general counsel for the Georgia State Canal Commission, which is as follows:

MAY 26, 1932.

Congressman W. C. LANKFORD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE: I am just in receipt of yours of the 24th instant, inclosing the statement you gave to the press for release May 27. I have carefully studied the statement and approve of it 100 per cent. I think it is a clear, sufficiently explanatory, and concise statement of the exact facts in the matter.

Its publication by the press of Georgia will, in my opinion, hearten the people of the entire State, because it signalizes the fact that, after many long years—50 or more—the Government has at last given official recognition, through the Board of Army Engineers, to the building of a barge canal connecting the Atlantic inland waterway system with the Gulf inland waterway system, the same to run through south Georgia and north Florida.

As I wrote you a few days ago, what you have accomplished is really a wonderful achievement and, without meaning to indulge in compliment, I think you are entitled to the congratulation and commendation of every man, woman, and child in the State. I particularly feel very pleased and very happy about it, because for nearly three years I have labored hard and earnestly on this particular project; and while we gained much progress in getting the items in the last rivers and harbors bill, that was all put in the discard by the report of the engineers of last December, and by their subsequent reports, all recommending a ship canal across Florida and a barge canal along the same route. You, therefore, by your fine, tactful, and energetic handling have not only revived the proposition but have put it completely on the map, because I haven't a doubt myself that when the physical survey of a barge canal route is rendered by the engineers Congress will almost immediately appropriate the funds and build the canal.

Cordially yours,

HOLLINS N. RANDOLPH.

I am very glad I sacrificed the opportunity of being chairman of an important House committee in order to go on the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, where I am in position to render real service to my district in connection with the location and construction of this canal.

My seniority entitles me to an appointment on the very largest committees of the House, but I would not, until this canal is built, give up my place on Rivers and Harbors for any other committee assignment. To my mind, the greatest committee of the Congress is the one where a Member can render the greatest service to his district. For me that committee is now Rivers and Harbors. If I live and stay in Congress, I shall stay on this committee until this canal is built across south Georgia and north Florida.

There are many other matters I would like to discuss in this letter, but I shall not be able to do so without making this letter too long.

I wish I could meet all the people of my district this summer and tell them of the serious problems now confronting us.

We are at the parting of the ways. We must save the farmers, the laborer, the independent business man, and the ordinary private citizen or all will be lost. I have some very definite ideas on farm relief, solution of the unemployment situation, taxation, the railroad questions, and others which I wish to discuss with my people.

I shall not, though, leave Washington while Congress is in session. My first duty is here. After the adjournment of Congress I hope to make several speeches in each county, giving a more complete account of my stewardship here and telling more fully of the principles for which I am contending than is at all possible in this letter.

I invite a careful study of what I have done, am now doing, and hope to do for the good people of my district and Nation.

Sincerely yours,

W. C. LANKFORD.

This letter contains the speech I had intended to make at this time. At a future date I shall be glad to discuss these matters more fully.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, our Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in keeping with the Sabath resolution, is holding hearings in connection with the expenditures of the Post Office Department. We expect to continue these hearings during the recess of Congress, and we ask the cooperation of Members on both sides. We have in mind recommending constructive measures that will reduce the deficit and put the Post Office Department on a better business basis.

I now want to discuss with you two of the biggest problems which confront our country at this time. These two problems, as you will no doubt agree, are the economic and the prohibition problems. The economic problem is, of course, the more important. It affects every man, woman, and child in the country. It affects every activity of Government and every activity of humanity. It includes the agricultural problem, and to-day we find agriculture in a deplorable condition, worse off now than ever in the history of American agriculture.

Agriculture is a basic industry, and until it is rehabilitated, until such time as tariff discriminations are rectified, agriculture will not come into its own, and the country in general will suffer because of the impoverished condition of this all-important industry. The creation of the Federal Farm Board in 1929 was a political gesture that has since proved itself to be a complete flop.

Unemployment, of course, enters into any economic debate or discussion, and, with approximately 10,000,000 out of work, it is a most serious question. According to a recent statement accredited to the president of the American Federation of Labor, 13,000,000 men and women will be without work in the coming winter.

The paralyzation of American industry is another phase of the economic question, but, looking toward the rehabilitation of our financial institutions, our railroads, and our industries, we have already enacted some remedial legislation. Therefore, the problems I desire to discuss with you are those that include unemployment and the prohibition question. Of the two questions prohibition is the simplest. Its solution is now in the hands of the American people.

We have during this session taken up this question on several different occasions, and the Members of the House have for the first time since the adoption of prohibition faced the issue, established their records, and now they go home for the approval or disapproval of their stand by the constituents they represent. This in itself will result in a referendum in which the people will make the decision.

Both political parties in convention assembled have taken action on this important question. The Republican Party has adopted a plank that is sometimes referred to as a wet-and-dry plank, an amphibian plank, good on land or water, a plank that dissatisfies the wets because it is too dry and disappoints the drys because it is too wet. Although nothing more than a straddle, they have taken a sort of a stand. It is the first time they have taken a stand—such as it is—on the question except to laud and defend it since the adoption of prohibition in 1919.

The Democratic Party, on the other hand, has adopted a clear, clean-cut, precise, definite plank that embodies within its provisions the acceptance on the part of the party of the responsibility to repeal the eighteenth amendment and to modify the Volstead Act. The plank adopted by the Democratic convention pleases the wets and commands the respect and admiration of the drys. It faces the issue honestly and sincerely.

The prohibition question is now ready for solution. It is now in the hands of the American people. The conventions have acted, the platforms have been adopted; and now the candidates go forth on these issues to the American people, and the verdict of the people as registered at the polls in November will settle the matter for a long time to come.

Republican Members of Congress from certain wet districts, smarting under the terrible handicap inflicted upon them by their convention, are striving to throw off that burden before they return home. They stand upon the floor of the House and demand action here and now. They have my sympathy.

Perhaps I would do the same thing if my party, blind to the demands of the day, subservient to the Anti-Saloon League, agreeing to play the duck-and-dodge game, adopted such a plank. It is certainly unfair to an honest wet or a sincere dry. Yes; we would be denouncing our party, demanding some action, in order that we might get out from under before we would face our constituency in the coming campaign, if we had adopted a plank that looks both ways as does the Republican plank.

Mr. Chairman, as I said in the beginning, the prohibition question is now up to the American people for solution and if there was an opportunity for the passage of remedial legislation, now so eagerly sought by the wets on the other side of the aisle, I would join and give them all the support and cooperation I possibly could. But they come too late, for the majority of their party in this and the other Chamber will not agree with them, and the action of the President in the last campaign, in defense of the "noble experiment," his action in connection with the work of the Wickersham commission, and his every public utterance in favor of prohibition would not permit a man in that exalted position to make such a somersault on the question in this late day of the session. Why, the dry leaders are now gathering in our city to indorse the President on his dry record.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say again the prohibition question is in the hands of the American people, and when we assemble here in December as a result of the action of the people, we will have not only the 190 votes we now have in this Chamber—but we will have, I predict, 250 wet votes that will insure a just and substantial modification of the Volstead Act. We will have a majority in the Senate as well, and we will have, after March 4 next, a man in the White House who will willingly sign a wet bill when it reaches him. This is my prophecy. [Applause.]

THE UNEMPLOYMENT QUESTION

The unemployment question on the other hand is far more complicated, and its proper solution is one that taxes the ability of the statesmanship and the leadership of Congress and the country. For nearly three years this scourge has been upon us and so far as this session of Congress is concerned nothing has been done that will remove the scourge. It is true that we have passed a number of measures recommended by the President, but these measures, every one of them, have only cushioned the fall, simonized the surface, stayed for a time the progress of the debacle.

To open the way for a proper approach to the solution of this question, we must find out how it developed, what brought it on, and what mistaken theories and practices have aggravated the situation.

In 1920 a depression which followed the industrial and financial breakdown of that time set in and developed through 1921 and 1922. Wage deflation and a general reduction in costs had been adopted to rebuild trade and industry, to restore prosperity, but this mistaken policy was without success. In 1923 a group of public officials and leading industrialists took issue with those who advocated the false program calling for a return to normalcy. This group condemned the reduction of wages and prices to a pre-war level as was advocated by those who would return to normalcy. The country was urged to get its mind away from the idea that pre-war wages and standards of living as well as volume of business would then be normal.

Normalcy, this leadership claimed, was a vastly higher and more comfortable standard than 1913. The leaders of the new order therefore advocated standardization of output, elimination of wastes from industry, the increased use of the machines to extend mass-production methods and to reduce labor and other costs of production. Under this policy it was contended that wage and salary rates could be increased while prices to consumers could be reduced, and at the same time generous profits would accrue to those in control of industry. These were revolutionary suggestions, but as a result of their adoption at that time an era of great prosperity set in and developed. Industrial, financial, and labor leaders accepted this new economic policy. It was a new industrial revolution, and the United States was to become the marvel of the world. Not only was man-hour productivity increased by improved machinery, new methods and processes in mines, plants, mills, and factories, but the very farms of the land were mechanized. European nations, including Russia, amazed at the changes and achievements in our industrial policy, sent special students and official commissions to the United States to observe and investigate the progress we were making.

This new era, beginning in 1923, came to an abrupt and disastrous termination in 1929, and its failure can be charged to our industrial and financial leadership, whose practices did not conform to the theories and principles laid down by the group of public officials and industrialists who initiated the program in 1923. Thus the hope of a new industrial régime in which capital would profit and humanity would benefit to a greater degree than ever was destroyed by a short-sighted and misguided desire for immediate and unreasonable profits.

In the building of an industrial machine such as was in progress during the years 1923 to 1929 certain fundamental principles should have been adhered to. We should have been concerned with the stabilizing as well as the planning for individual and collective industries. Prices should have been reduced, which would have increased real income as well as the consuming capacity of our people. Wages and salaries should have been advanced in comparison to reduced costs and not in accordance with consumption demands. Hours of labor should have been reduced to offset mechanical displacements and reduced employment. Too large a proportion of the wealth produced during this period was reserved for profit, while it should have gone to increasing the purchasing and consuming power of our people. The failure on the part of our industrial and financial leaders to adopt a permanent policy, failure to stabilize our industries, failure to plan for the present and future of our industries, brought about the disaster which, of course, was inevitable under such circumstances. The displacement of men by machines increased constantly, and in 1927 and 1928 the country became disturbed because of the large numbers then out of work as a result of technological displacements. This situation continued to increase steadily until the stock market collapsed in October 1929.

Had the productive gains resulting from the new industrial development been fairly apportioned to labor as well as to capital, we could have maintained our prosperity and averted the economic crisis which now overwhelms us. The denial of higher wages and salaries to our workers in keeping with their increased productivity, as well as the refusal on the part of industry to recognize the need for a shorter work period, decreased consumer purchasing power and accelerated unemployment. Under such a system a collapse was inevitable. Highly capitalized security values could no longer be maintained and our new economic development which had its origin in 1923 broke down, precipitating the stock market crash and the general deflation which finally passed out of control and which now threatens our economic and political institutions. Immediately after the break those in control of our industrial, financial, and credit resources demanded drastic reduction in wages which further decreased the demand for goods and added to the seriousness of the present crisis. With the beginning of the current year, alarmed at the continuance of the depression and in an effort to check the avalanche of deflation which threatened to destroy everything in its path, a program was presented to Congress and quickly approved in the hope that it would remedy the situation. Included in this relief program were the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, the Glass-Steagall banking bill, the farm loan and home loan bank bills, as well as several minor measures.

In addition to this program, reserve banks adopted a policy of open-market operations, purchasing millions of Government securities each week in an effort to improve the banking situation. The effects of these measures and policies were merely palliative and conserving and, while the epidemic of bank failures has been checked, the general situation is not improved. Our problem is to provide for the immediate relief of our unemployed; relief that will prevent indescribable suffering which will take place this coming winter unless we act now. Second, we must restore the lost purchasing power of our people. This can only be accomplished by creating employment opportunities financed by the Federal Government. This involves a public-works program and should include Federal, State, and municipal undertakings. Many of these projects would be self-liquidating. All of them would provide large employment opportunities. Private industries and public enterprises, whose activities and expansions could meet with the approval of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, should also receive assistance in order that they, too, might increase employment. If such a program was adopted and properly applied, it should turn the tide of the depression. In the promotion of this enterprise it should be remembered that the basic procedure involved is the authorization of the use of Federal Government credit and not merely a bond issue, as is sometimes suggested.

This credit might consist partly of a direct issue of bonds for direct relief and public works, and it might include an authorization to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to issue more debentures or other evidence of debt to the banks and public, or Government bonds might be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury and the proceeds used by the Secretary to purchase the debentures or evidence of debt emitted by the Finance Corporation. If this program of public works is authorized, the Government should insist upon a 6-hour workday with a 5-day week, in order to extend the field of employment, and this shorter work period should become a permanent fixture in public and private endeavor. Once business is under way we must insist that the blunders responsible for the present debacle be eliminated in the future, and to bring this about a Federal agency with powers to aid in the stabilization of industry and to perform the work of an advisory economic council should be created. Above all, we must recognize the fact that our prosperity in the future is contingent upon the proper and equal division of the profits of industry, and so forth. Workers supplanted by machines or other labor-saving methods must be absorbed by new industries or by a reduction in the hours of service. From our experiences in the past we can not hope to avoid similar breakdowns in the future unless we plan, guide, and keep stable our economic development.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the work of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the large postal deficit, the committee's first concern this session was to consider means whereby the postal receipts might be increased, and it is interesting to note that when the committee was reached on the calendar early in March, with the privilege of bringing its reported bills before the House, of the 10 bills passed that day, seven were for revenue purposes—making adjustments in rates for special services, requiring fees to compensate the Post Office Department for the work involved in passing upon applications for certain postal privileges, and eliminating some of the free services for which the department felt it should be paid.

The Post Office Department's attitude toward the cooperative work of the committee was expressed by the Third

Assistant Postmaster General who, at a hearing before the committee, stated:

* * * the prompt and able efforts of your committee which have resulted in the enactment by the House of Representatives of several bills embodying recommendations of the department to increase the postal revenues in the neighborhood of $15,000,000.

In addition to the bills included in the above statement, the committee has reported other revenue-producing postal-rate measures, bringing the total anticipated revenues from such bills to between $17,500,000 and $20,000,000. Five of these bills have already been enacted and are being put into effect by the Post Office Department, while two others are at the White House awaiting the President's consideration. It is believed that this legislation, together with the increased postal rates on first and second class mail matter provided in the revenue act sponsored by the Committee on Ways and Means, will greatly reduce the postal deficit in the fiscal year just begun.

The committee is greatly concerned with the welfare of the postal employees. Many bills for the relief of substitute postal employees have been given consideration and extensive hearings held in this connection. Early in the session the committee reported a bill (H. R. 4719) providing leave with pay for substitutes. This was promptly passed by the House and sent to the Senate. The committee also believes that in endeavoring to increase the postal revenues and build up the service it is indirectly benefiting the substitutes as well as the regular postal employees.

Because of the abnormal reduction in postal receipts, the salaries of postmasters, assistant postmasters, and supervisors, which are based thereon, have been greatly reduced. On July 1, 1931, 4,681 postmasters were reduced; on July 1, 1932, 6,848 were reduced. On July 1, 1931, 232 assistant postmasters were reduced; on July 1, 1932, 570 assistant postmasters were reduced. On July 1, 1931, 323 supervisors were reduced; on July 1, 1932, 547 supervisors were reduced. These workers have also been affected by the economy law, which applies to all Government employees.

The committee tried to avert these unusual reductions in salary caused by the falling off in postal revenues, but its bill to this effect (H. R. 6305) is still pending before the House. The committee's bill (H. R. 4602) to compensate third-class postmasters who furnish their own equipment is in the same status.

The salaries of all postal employees are being reduced by the economy law. The Post Office Department's policy for some time, however, has been to effect economies wherever possible, by means of curtailed service, consolidations in rural routes as vacancies occur, and so forth. During the fiscal year 1931 more than 800 rural routes were merged in this manner, with a reduction in the annual rate of cost of nearly $890,000.

It was brought to the committee's attention that more business might be given private printers if the Government should discontinue the practice of printing return corner cards on stamped envelopes. After lengthy hearings, the committee took favorable action in this connection and reported H. R. 8576 to the House, and several Members later appeared before the Rules Committee asking for a rule for the special consideration of the bill by the House.

The committee has also reported favorably a bill to permit the submission and publishing of statements of ownership, circulation, and so forth, of newspapers, magazines, periodicals, and other publications once a year, instead of twice a year, as now required by law.

While only 24 bills were reported, the committee has had many others under consideration, 127 bills and resolutions having been referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads during this first session. In addition to the hearings held on relief measures for the substitute postal employees, salaries of postmasters, assistant postmasters, and supervisors, and equipment allowance for third-class postmasters, there have been extensive hearings with respect to the air mail service, parcel post, purchases of supplies for the Post Office Department, threatening communications in the mail, puzzle contests, fraudulent devices and lottery paraphernalia, postal savings, stamped envelopes, mail matter for the blind, and other rate measures.

Pursuant to House Resolution 226, the committee will conduct an investigation into all mail contracts as well as post-office sites, post-office buildings, and power, heat, and light contracts, with the view of obtaining information necessary as a basis for legislation. Hearings in this connection have been begun and will be continued during the summer by special subcommittees being appointed for the purpose.

A résumé of the bills reported by the committee this session follows:

COMMITTEE BILLS ENACTED INTO LAW

H. R. 96: To punish the sending through the mails of certain threatening communications. Signed July 8, 1932. Public Law No. 274.

H. R. 4594: To fix the rate of postage on publications mailed at the office of entry for delivery at another post office within the postal district in which the headquarters or general business offices of the publisher are located. Signed June 28, 1932. Public Law No. 201. Estimated additional revenue, indeterminate.

H. R. 8317: To provide for fees for entry of a publication as second-class matter, and for other purposes. Signed July 7, 1932. Public Law No. 271. Estimated additional revenue, $500,000.

H. R. 8318: To amend section 287 of title 39 of the United States Code, Supplement V. (Transient second-class rates of postage.) Signed July 5, 1932. Public Law No. 262. Estimated additional revenue, $500,000.

H. R. 10244: Fixing the fees and limits of indemnity for domestic registered mail based upon actual value and length of haul, and for other purposes. Signed June 28, 1932. Public Law No. 202. Estimated additional revenue, $7,000,000.

H. R. 10247: Prescribing fees and corresponding indemnities for domestic insured and collect-on-delivery mail of the third and fourth classes, and for other purposes. Signed June 28, 1932. Public Law No. 203. Estimated additional revenue, $2,500,000.

COMMITTEE BILLS PASSED BY HOUSE AND SENATE AND SENT TO PRESIDENT

H. R. 10246: To fix the fees to be charged for the issue of domestic money orders. Estimated additional revenue, $1,250,000.

H. R. 10494: To provide a postage charge on notices to publishers regarding undeliverable second-class matter. Estimated additional revenue. $250,000.

COMMITTEE BILLS PASSED BY HOUSE AND REPORTED TO SENATE

H. R. 278: To compensate the Post Office Department for the extra work caused by the payment of money orders at offices other than those on which the orders are drawn. Estimated additional revenue, $20,000.

H. R. 9636: To authorize the Postmaster General to permit railroad and electric-car companies to provide mail transportation by motor vehicle in lieu of service by train.

COMMITTEE BILLS PASSED BY HOUSE AND REFERRED TO SENATE POST OFFICE COMMITTEE

H. R. 4719: Granting leaves of absence with pay to substitutes in the Postal Service.

H. R. 6688: To fix the rates of postage on certain periodicals exceeding 8 ounces in weight; estimated additional revenue indeterminate.

H. R. 9262: To amend section 321 of title 18 of the United States Code. (To curb the practice of depositing statements of account, circulars, sale bills, etc., in letter boxes or other receptacles established for the receipt or delivery of mail without payment of postage thereon.) Estimated additional revenue, $4,000,000.

H. R. 10644: To require postmasters to account for money collected on parcels delivered at their respective offices.

COMMITTEE BILL REPORTED TO HOUSE AND TABLED

H. R. 5612: To limit the purchases of the Post Office Department, so far as possible, to articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States. (See Post Office Department appropriation bill.)

COMMITTEE BILLS BEFORE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

H. R. 4602: Granting equipment allowance to third-class postmasters.

H. R. 6305: To amend the act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes. (To defer reductions in salaries of postmasters, assistant postmasters, and supervisors, which are based on postal receipts.)

H. R. 8576: To regulate the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes.

H. R. 9555: To authorize the Postmaster General to hire vehicles from postal employees.

H. R. 10462: To prohibit the use of the United States mails for the transmission of any matter advertising puzzle contests, naming contests, prize offers, or any other form of competition for a prize wherein such offers are made to induce persons to compete in another contest which involves either the purchase or sale of goods as a requisite of winning.

H. R. 11152: To amend section 293, title 39, of the United States Code, Supplement V, to promote Parcel Post Service. Estimated additional revenue, $1,500,000 to $4,000,000.

H. R. 11270: To amend section 2 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes." (Organization statements from newspapers, magazines, etc.)

SENATE BILLS PASSED BY SENATE AND REFERRED TO HOUSE COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS

S. 88: To authorize the Postmaster General to investigate the conditions of the lease of the post-office garage in Boston, Mass., and to readjust the terms thereof. Reported to House July 14, 1932.

S. 621: To repeal section 7 of the postal act approved May 29, 1928. (Parcel post.) Reported to House April 21, 1932.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOUSER].

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the few remarks I make this afternoon during this talk fest, which is costing the American taxpayer money, will be helpful.

I had in mind making a few remarks in regard to the necessity of repealing that iniquitous part of the tax bill which charges the issuer of each check 2 cents. When this measure passed the House I raised my voice in humble protest. I said we were trying to encourage business; we were trying to get money out of hoarding; but that the effect of this tax would be to make people take their money from deposit accounts in banks and put it in safety-deposit boxes, and that they would go to those boxes for money when they paid their living expenses. I believe that prophecy is coming true, and I am glad to see men on both sides of the aisle raise their voices against this proposition. In these closing days of the session, instead of killing time when we are talking about reducing expenses, let us get busy and remedy this situation.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOUSER. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a brief question.

Mr. HARLAN. Did the gentleman vote for the limited sales tax, which was the only means by which we could raise sufficient revenue without resorting to this stamp tax?

Mr. MOUSER. I did not vote for the sales tax because it was a smoke screen behind which the multimillionaires of this country wanted to place the entire tax burden upon the backs of the humble. [Applause.] I regret that the gentleman from Dayton was so misled by that kind of propaganda that he was willing to place upon the backs of his constituents for all time to come that kind of a tax.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOUSER. For a brief question.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that the sales tax was a Democratic creature, strongly supported by the multimillionaires who have the ability to pay, and that it came out of the Democratic-controlled Ways and Means Committee in this session of Congress, which has a Democratic majority and Speaker? Yet the Democrats had the intestinal stamina to write a tax plank in their platform pledging their party in favor of Federal taxation according to ability to pay.

Mr. MOUSER. I do not believe I am quite as partisan as my friend from Milwaukee. There were many men on my right who disregarded the appeal for this tax when a certain person, actuated by selfish motives, tried to put that across on the American people, and I give them credit for it.

I want to address myself for a few minutes to the necessity of getting down to business and passing the important measures now before us in the interest of economy and going back to our homes. Every day we delay in this House it is costing the American taxpayers $41,000. The more we embark upon the dangerous seas of isms and experiments, we are doing so to the detriment of the American taxpayer. It is easy to talk; it is easy to theorize and conjecture, but we are forgetting that a pay day must come.

We must pass a relief bill. I hope that politics will not be injected at this critical hour, but I do not believe any sane person can believe that by creating a superbanking structure and the necessity of adding a great many employees, thousands of them, to the pay rolls in order to carry out the administrative features of such a superbanking structure, we are going to relieve the situation. I do not believe the humble citizen, who is out of work to-day, has sufficient security to obtain one of those loans. So we are simply holding out a futile hope to him. We are raising his hopes, and then when he can not get his loan he is going to bitterly resent it.

When we are talking about the creation of boards and commissions, about the necessity of reducing overlapping governmental activities, about the necessity of taking parasites off of the pay roll in one breath, and in the next breath talking about creating a bureaucratic superbanking institution, run by the Federal Government, and necessitating the employment of hundreds of thousands of additional employees, we are inconsistent. But we must pass a relief measure.

Many of us who are voting and talking for economy realize that when we loan $300,000,000 to the States for relief, we are taking that money out of the Federal Treasury. Pay day is going to come. That money has to be taken away from other activities, and next winter we are going to be faced with the problem of placing further taxes upon the backs of the American people. I want to say to you, my colleagues, that your constituents and mine have become tax minded. They are not going to stand for a further burden upon them. However, realizing the necessity of taking care of the hungry and the unemployed, we are willing to vote for the $300,000,000. We are willing to add to the powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation so that it may loan to self-liquidating organizations.

It is the worst kind of demagoguery and hypocrisy to say that when you loan to the railroad companies you are not helping the employee or that you are not keeping men in jobs. Two towns in my district would to-day be absolutely stagnated if it were not for the pay rolls of the Erie Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. Is that helping the common man? Are you helping the common man when you are loaning money to insure the integrity of the life-insurance policies of 65,000,000 policyholders in the country, the rank and file of the people, the head of a family who has invested in life insurance in order that his wife and his little ones may be taken care of on a rainy day when he has passed into the Great Beyond? Such a man is not able to save anything except his life insurance because he is under the necessity of putting his humble pay to work for the living expenses of his family.

Let us quit talking theory. Let us quit conjecturing. Let us pass a relief measure that is sound, that is not tinged with political demagoguery, and then adjourn this Congress, after passing the home loan bank bill and the other measures now pending in order that we will practice that which we are preaching, economy. Let us stop this expenditure of $41,000 a day every day we are in session. [Applause.] I appeal to you, regardless of party, to practice economy and not be making a lot of hot-air speeches on the floor of this House about it. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the members of the committee to two pending bills, one the Bacharach bill, which reduces the rate of interest on the adjusted-service certificates to 4 per cent, and the Norris bill, which passed the Senate and is now pending before the House, which reduces the rate of interest on these certificates to 3 per cent, both of the bills also making available the 50 per cent loan on the adjusted-service certificates to World War veterans who have had them for less than two years and under existing law may not borrow on them until the expiration of the 2-year period.

There is a great deal of criticism by millions of veterans in this country of the action of the Congress in permitting the Treasury Department and the Government to charge the veterans 4½ per cent interest. The veterans are merely a cross section of the American people. They are good, bad, and indifferent, but at least they know this: That if the Government continues to charge the veterans 4½ per cent for the next 13 years, until these certificates mature in 1945, it will eat up the balance of the certificates and the veterans will have nothing left at all. I submit it was never the intention of the Members of Congress to exploit the veterans or to profit at the expense of the veterans.

I introduced six months ago two separate bills, one reducing the rate of interest on the adjusted-service certificates to 3 per cent, and the other making available the 50 per cent loan to all World War veterans regardless of the date of issue of the certificates. I would have preferred to have the bills reported and considered separately, but am willing to support any compromise in order to get action before the adjournment of Congress.

The Government can raise money at 4 per cent. It is charging the veterans four and a half per cent. A year ago the Treasury Department floated a bond issue at 3⅛ per cent, and on that basis made a profit of 1⅜ per cent on every loan at the expense of the veteran. It seems to me to be only an act of fairness and of justice to pass one of these bills before we adjourn, either the Bacharach bill reducing it to 4 per cent or the Norris bill reducing it to 3 per cent, or, perhaps, better yet, a compromise of the two establishing a rate of interest of three and a half per cent.

I do not propose nor have I the time to speak about the veterans who have marched upon Washington. Of course, they had the right to come here. They had the right to petition the Congress. I doubt very much, however, whether they will have any influence in shaping legislation, as the Congress is not easily coerced and is not in sympathy with the attempt of any group of Americans to influence legislation by marching upon Washington. These bonus marchers are a mere handful of veterans—some ten or fifteen thousand—out of 4,000,000; but back of these veterans, not in sympathy with their march on Washington, however, are millions of veterans who honestly believe that the Government is profiteering on their adjusted-service certificates, which the Government gave them as adjusted compensation for their World War services.

At the last convention of the American Legion there was a bitter fight over whether the Legion should go on record for the payment in full of the adjusted-service certificates or whether they would oppose it. Those who opposed a payment at this time won after a full, fair, and free debate by a vote of 2 to 1; but I can say to the Members of the Congress that if you do not take some action before adjournment toward reducing the rate of interest to 4 per cent or 3½ per cent or even 3 per cent, there is apt to be a majority at the next national convention of the American Legion, to be held in September, that will ask for the payment in full of these certificates. I am opposed to the payment of the adjusted-service certificates at this time because the finances of the Government will not stand it, but certainly there is no one in Congress who desires for one moment to make money at the expense of these veterans upon these certificates.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have great sympathy with the sentiment of the speech the gentleman is making, and I quite agree with him. I am wondering just what action is preventing the adoption of one of these bills during the present session of Congress. We are wasting time this afternoon and they talk about adjourning over until next Monday because of lack of business. Why not do the very thing the gentleman is talking about now?

Mr. FISH. I rose to call the attention of the Members of Congress who agree with me to this situation. I am of the opinion that the distinguished Speaker of this House, when we reach suspensions, will recognize the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] for the passage of his bill or the Norris bill; but if that is not done, it is up to the Members of the House themselves to demand action.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman believe the Democratic Speaker will recognize anybody for suspension of the rules in this case any more than he is going to recognize some of the leaders of his party to move to suspend the rules and consider eighteenth-amendment and Volstead Act legislation?

Mr. FISH. I agree with the gentleman to this extent: The responsibility for legislation in the House rests upon the shoulders of the Democrats. They are in control of the House and in control of the committees. I think they have been very fair in permitting the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH], a Republican, to have his bill reported out, and therefore I believe they see the wisdom of passing this legislation during this session of the Congress. I sincerely trust that I am not mistaken in my views of the attitude of the Democratic leaders. I have just been home in my district and talked with a great many veterans during a Fourth of July celebration, and they all told me the same story. They are sore, they are bitter, and believe that they have a justifiable grievance against Congress, and so do I. They are all, of course, loyal to our country and our institutions; but they are bitter against Congress and against the Government for charging these high rates of interest that mean that at the end of 13 years there will not be a penny left on these certificates. That was not the intention of Congress; and if we do not remedy the situation, it will become a travesty and a farce.

The Democratic candidate for the Presidency, in accepting his nomination, suggested that the rate of interest on farm mortgages be reduced throughout the country. In Congress we have reduced the rate of interest on all of our war debts. We reduced the rate of interest on some of the war debts down to 1 per cent and down to 1½ and 2 per cent for others, and yet we have and are charging the veterans 4½ per cent when the Government can raise money at 4 per cent, and in the past has been able to raise money at 3 per cent.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. SABATH. That act was passed by a Republican Congress, permitting these exorbitant rates to be charged to the veterans of the World War.

Mr. FISH. Well, the Democrats are in control of the House now and I believe you are going to help reduce the rate, and I believe you want it done.

Mr. SABATH. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FISH. And I ask every Democrat who agrees with me to help to reduce the existing high rate of interest before we adjourn, because otherwise you are going to make it very difficult, not only for every Member of Congress when he goes home, but you are going to make it very difficult for the American Legion to continue its stand against payment of the adjusted-service certificates in full at the present time.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] tried to place the blame for this on a Republican Congress. Is it not a fact that the Republicans are the only ones that placed on the statute books worth-while bonus legislation and other veterans' legislation? When we came out of the war, as a Democratic bonus, we got $60, and that was all.

Mr. FISH. Yes. We Republicans voted for these measures in the past and we are not apologizing for voting for them now. We are merely trying to do what is right and fair in view of the recent development of the loan situation.

Mr. SCHAFER. Perhaps the Democrats do not want to pass this legislation because it will interfere with their promise in their platform to cut $1,000,000,000 from the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. FISH. Now, in these few moments remaining, I would like to place myself on record, as far as public works and relief are concerned. I regard that, by far, the most important issue before the country.

I believe that the Republicans and Democrats are subject to very severe criticism for not bringing into the House several months ago a constructive relief program and giving it preference over all other bills that have been brought up in the House.

It is very well to talk about balancing the Budget. We are all for that, but it does not help the man who is hungry and unemployed, it does not mean much to him as he walks the street looking for a job.

The unemployed in America are not seeking charity or doles, but jobs, and that is the outstanding issue; and yet Congress has delayed consideration of it until the very last moment before adjournment, and, consequently, because of hastily drawn up and inadequate legislation, has gotten into a legislative jam.

If the President vetoes the relief bill, which he says he will, I hope when it is brought back the Committee on Ways and Means will consider this suggestion. I do not care whether there is a bond issue of $500,000,000 or a billion, I am for the bond issue if it is necessary for needed public works and relief purposes, but I would like to see a bond issue of $500,000,000 or a billion backed up by a 1-cent sales tax. I believe that you would find both organized labor and conservative business elements in favor of such a proposition, as it would help turn the wheels of industry and provide employment.

The distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] made a very able speech in regard to the proposal to reduce the Navy. I do not know which side he took. [Laughter.] But on numerous occasions I have pleaded with this House to try and save vast naval expenditures by reducing the number of battleships, through agreement with Great Britain and Japan, from 18, which both Great Britain and the United States now have, to 10, and 6 for Japan. Then we would have exactly the same proportional national defense and we could save $100,000,000 annually.

Only to-day, according to the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, Great Britain has agreed to such a program. She has agreed to cut her battleships down by one-third or more; and if we are sincere, if we want to balance the Budget, if we really believe in economy and are sincere in our protestations for world peace and limitation of armaments, then we should accept the offer of Great Britain without hiding behind hypocritical subterfuges and talking about the necessity of military disarmament as being an indispensable requirement before we can proportionally reduce the number of our battleships. What rank hypocrisy and what a travesty as an answer to an offer from Great Britain to further reduce the number of costly battleships and thereby lift a burden of $100,000,000 a year from the shoulders of our overburdened taxpayers. I am for national defense and I am for the maintenance in full of the 5-5-3 ratio; but I am at the same time in favor of commensurate and proportional limitation in the number of these huge and expensive battleships costing forty millions to build and at least three millions to operate each year. I know of no easier or safer way to reduce governmental expenditures $100,000,000 annually and at the same time maintaining the same proportional national defense and security than by entering into an agreement with Great Britain and Japan, two nations heavily burdened with taxes, to further reduce on the 5-5-3 basis the number of battleships and battle cruisers over 10,000 tons.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, two of the main issues that will be brought forth in the coming national political campaign will be unemployment and the protective tariff. It is very evident that the Democratic Party is going to attack the Republican Party's policy of protection. They have a plank in their platform in which they pledge their candidate for President to call an international conference with foreign countries on the tariff question.

My own personal opinion is that we are able to settle our own domestic questions without calling in the aid or assistance of any foreign country. [Applause.]

I have always believed in the principle of protection. I live in what is probably one of the greatest industrial districts in the United States, and many years ago that district was represented in this Congress by that champion of all champions of the protective tariff, William McKinley. Therefore, coming from a district of that character, it is only natural that I should be in favor of a protective tariff. I have asked these five minutes this afternoon in order to read into the RECORD a statement which I have received from George H. Charls, the president of the National Association of Flat Rolled Steel Manufacturers, with offices located in Cleveland, Ohio. The title of the statement is "Foreign Dumping Menaces United States Steel Industry."

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not now.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I wanted to ask if this is the same communication that we all received in the morning mail.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio refuses to yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I read:

FOREIGN DUMPING MENACES UNITED STATES STEEL INDUSTRY

If we are to save the American steel industry, its workers, stockholders, and all those industries and utilities depending upon it, from the economic madness now rampant in continental Europe, if we are to prevent more paralyzing unemployment, if we are to restrain all our coastal business from seceding to European mills, some immediately effective emergency action is imperative.

Never in the history of the steel industry have such demoralizing prices been made as in the reckless dumping of foreign steel in the United States to-day; cargoes of wire dumped into the heart of Chicago; bars into Detroit; wire, bars, shapes, plates, strips, and sheets dumped along our entire seaboard, at prices which, with duty paid, are $10 to $25 per ton less than American producers can name.

It is a crucial situation.

In the morning paper we read: "England raises from 10 to 33⅓ per cent import duty on pig iron, castings weighing under 1 hundredweight and spring steel, effective June 13."

This last move about completes the 33⅓ per cent duty on all steel products imported in England.

When England, the bulwark of free trade, finds it necessary to boost her tariff—not, as some would have us believe, in retaliation to the American tariff policy, but actually to save her steel industry from being closed down tight by the influx of cheap continental steel—it is in order that the United States take heed and act at once.

France to protect her home markets (although dumping in other countries) is virtually embargoing steel by a system of license arrangements which limits almost to the zero point the tonnage which can be imported from other countries. According to the last report, the United States is limited to 80 tons of sheets per month.

From a prominent steel producer in England we have the following: "Sheet bars are being sold in this country at 81 shillings delivered into South Wales with a 33⅓ per cent duty to pay. This leaves the Belgian not more than 30 shillings per ton at his works for tinplate bars, which is certainly 12 to 13 shillings per ton below the cost of the pig iron required for the manufacture of bars."

Out of a population of 40,000,000, a total of 2,700,000 English workers are unemployed, and each unemployed man gets the dole of 15 shillings 3 pence per week, plus 10 shillings for a wife, plus 3 shillings for the first child and 2 shillings for each additional child. Each man in work pays 10 pence, and the employer pays 10 pence per week for each man employed, and the state makes up the balance when necessary.

From these facts and figures one can understand why England has been compelled to raise her tariff.

Aware of what has happened in England, will we supinely submit to this foreign dumping dementia being imposed upon American industry, with its corollary, the character-desiccating dole?

The American steel industry asked for no increase in duty in the Smoot-Hawley bill of 1930, and it received none. The existing rates are those of the Fordney-McCumber bill of 1922.

Under normal conditions these rates would suffice and reasonably protect American workingmen and producers.

But the conditions are not normal, because, with all the protection the tariff can afford and if common labor in the production of American steel were reduced to 75 cents a day or $19.50 a month, American producers could not possibly meet this foreign competition. These, incidentally, are the labor rates paid by the most aggressive foreign producers invading our shores.

With the American steel worker, whose wages were never inflated, now working 20 per cent of the time, bearing up under wage reductions of 25 per cent or more; with practically every steel corporation's statement showing large losses; with steel executives exhausting every recourse to furnish some sort of employment to their men, any further temporizing with this menace will be fatal.

The following summary of first-quarter statements is nothing short of tragic. After a strenuous period of cutting production and sales costs, overhead, salaries, wages, and for the most part passing dividends, we still find the 19 leading steel producers showing a loss of almost $30,000,000 in the first quarter of 1932:

Allegheny Steel Co	$366,378
American Rolling Mill Co	571,917
Bethlehem Steel Co	3,685,769
Colorado Fuel & Iron Co	399,278
Eastern Rolling Mill Co	169,751
Follansbee Bros. Co	301,196
Gulf States Steel Co	144,196
Granite City Steel Co	37,896
Inland Steel Co	820,541
Interlake Iron Corporation	391,495
Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation	2,399,089
Ludlum Steel Co	50,920
Newton Steel Co	126,132
Otis Steel Co	701,162
Republic Steel Corporation	2,476,292
Superior Steel Corporation	150,644
United States Steel Corporation	13,218,549
Wheeling Steel Corporation	823,137
Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co	3,057,736
Total	29,892,078

Political differences of opinion on protective measures become unworthy in the face of this crisis. Only coalition and sound, economic statesmanship can save us; increased hardships and distress for hundreds of thousands of steel workers is the alternative.

A close-up portraying the conditions in the countries from which these frantic policies emanate seems most pertinent.

What are the conditions and motives prompting such desperate tactics? What is behind it all?

The gist of the whole deplorable affair is that the principal steel works of Belgium have turned their plants into public utilities for providing gas, electricity, and power to the more populous districts of that country according to quotas arranged among themselves.

This gave them a tremendous advantage in selling cheap steel. Then came the depreciation of the pound sterling and the increased British duty. This action struck consternation to the hearts of the steel makers in Belgium, France, Luxemburg, and Germany, because England was their most important market.

However, the Belgian steel producers, driven by the necessity of their municipal contracts to operate, must dispose of their steel. Possibly hoping that the gold standard would be restored and the duty eliminated, they continued delivered sterling prices only slightly higher than those they had accepted before, and absorbed both the 33⅓ per cent duty and the 25 per cent depreciation in pound sterling.

The French and German steel makers were compelled to follow suit.

On top of this, wages were reduced in Belgium, and common labor receives approximately 75 cents per day, rollers $1.75 to $2.25 per day. Only slightly higher wage rates apply in France and Germany.

In the two latter countries they have some assistance from an export bounty, which averages 10 to 30 per cent. This bounty is paid at the expense of the domestic client who pays higher prices for equivalent product. It is not, as is commonly understood, a Government refund but a pool made up by manufacturers. All Belgian-Luxemburg steel is sold through a syndicate, but there is no information on any bounty on exports, their municipal contracts for gas, electricity, and power evidently take care of that.

In addition to the above, unbelievably low ship rates are obtained to all foreign countries. As low as $3 per ton applies from Antwerp to the United States, and it is more than probable that there is a rebate beyond these published rates.

As a result, at shareholders' meetings in France and Germany it is a common confession that plants are being kept working by recourse to sales abroad at disastrous prices. Prices are down 50 per cent since 1930, leaving producers with a loss of 30 to 40 per cent on the cost of production, according to testimony of the French comite des forges.

This same comite des forges is forced to the conclusion that the only real remedy lies in international ententes to make production conform to consumption. They state, "The process of deflation might work itself out in its own way—unless, indeed, the problem of unemployment and social discontent becomes such as to force governments to step in and try to regulate industries."

This is the "economic madness" and "foreign dumping dementia" referred to in previous paragraphs. It seems to call for the most effective barrier possible, namely, an embargo.

Since 1921 the United States has not exported more than 5.93 per cent of its steel production in any one year; and

The maximum of 2,480,000 tons (steel exported in 1929) was 4.45 per cent of the 55,650,000 tons produced in that peak year of the steel industry of the United States.

Since 1922, with a maximum annual production of a little over 6,000,000 tons, Belgium and Luxemburg have never exported less than 2,471,000 tons; and

In 1931 they exported 3,650,000 tons as against 725,000 tons by the United States in the same year.

In the last seven years England, France, and Germany have consistently exported one to two million tons more of steel than did the United States, with a maximum productive capacity of nine and one-half million tons in England and France and 16,000,000 tons in Germany.

English exports have averaged in that period from 36 to 83 per cent of all the steel she produced; Germany, 26 to 47 per cent; France, 43 to 70 per cent; Belgium-Luxemburg, 69 to 76 per cent.

Contrast these with the 5.93 per cent maximum exports of the United States.

From the foregoing it will be seen that European steel makers have depended to a very great extent on export markets to run their plants. Now that these markets have been closed to them or their purchases restricted by one reason or another, they are dumping their cheap products in the United States.

The term "cheap products" is used advisedly. It is cheap Bessemer steel, usually quoted $5 a ton lower than what is termed "good open-hearth steel" by the makers themselves. It is a cheap galvanized product. Samples of a well-known brand made in Belgium averaged eight-tenths of an ounce of zinc coating per square foot. It is so cheap in price that if all the labor charges were eliminated from the cost of galvanizing these sheets, American producers could not compete.

The absurdity of selling galvanized sheets at £1 per ton, or 16 cents per hundredweight more than the price of black sheets, is painfully obvious even though such sheets carry but eight-tenths of an ounce of zinc coating per square foot.

Estimating 30 man-hours of labor to the production of a ton of the heavier grades of finished steel at the average wage now applying in the American steel industry, one can readily compute from the prices quoted on foreign steel delivered along our seaboard that if all labor charges were eliminated from the cost to American steel producers, they could not compete with the freight rates now existing from the mills to the American seaboard.

The question of protecting American steel interests is no longer debatable. Especially is this true if we keep definitely in mind that every ton of foreign steel imported into the United States means the loss of approximately four days' work to some steel laborer.

In addition thereto it means a loss by the railroads and their employees of the transportation of 4 to 5 tons of raw material necessary for the production of 1 ton of finished steel, together with a proportionate loss to all industries, utilities, and labor serving the steel industry.

The seriousness of the situation is demonstrated by what occurred in 1931, when 370,000 net tons of imported steel caused the loss of a week's work to 237,000 men in the steel industry and 37,000 coal miners, and the loss in revenue and wages to the railroads of transporting approximately 55,000 cars at an average of 33 tons per car.

One can easily be internationally minded and maintain a liberal attitude regarding the advantages of a free interchange of products between nations until confronted with an increased unemployment and destitution among friends and neighbors due to the importation of foreign goods.

This is indeed just what we have to contend with now and it is to be hoped that any further temporizing with this desperate situation will be supplanted by determined measures to effect their remedy, which seems to exist only in an embargo against all dumping of foreign steel in the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, some few weeks ago the Secretary of Agriculture in a public address said the United States was the greatest dub in the world when it comes to loaning money. This assertion made by the Secretary was well founded upon the facts within his knowledge based upon the experience of the Agricultural Department and the Department of Justice with reference to the abuses that have been perpetrated upon the Government by some of those who have been the recipients of the Government's bounty through loans made to farmers in the storm, flood, and drought-stricken areas of the United States; and that Congress may know and that the taxpayers may know how the Government has been imposed upon, I deem it advisable that information be given disclosing the fraudulent practices that have been resorted to in some of the sections of this country to obtain these loans and to evade payment thereof.

For each of the years 1929, 1930, and 1931 the Secretary of Agriculture, under appropriate legislation of the Congress, made seed, feed, and fertilizer loans to farmers in the storm, flood, and drought stricken areas of the United States. The first year the legislation was enacted and approved for the relief of farmers of the Southeastern States; but for the other two years the territory to be benefited was increased to cover the entire agricultural area where the need for such assistance was shown to exist. The loans were made, in the discretion of the Secretary, under regulations promulgated by him, in sums not in excess of $2,000 to any one borrower, and through agencies prescribed by the Secretary.

During the three years named, approximately $400,000 was loaned to farmers in Houston County, Ala., alone, and comparable sums were loaned to farmers in numerous other counties of that State for the same years.

In the late summer and early fall of 1931 reports were made of numerous frauds having been practiced in the obtaining of those loans in southeastern Alabama and elsewhere, including Houston County; and an investigation of the loans in that county for the said three years was commenced during the last few days of August, 1931.

The investigation of loans in Houston County, Ala., involved approximately 800 loans, and, as the result of the investigation, upward of 60 indictments were returned covering such offenses as straight violations of the penal clauses of the respective seed-loan resolutions, conspiracies to defraud the United States, conspiracies to violate other criminal statutes, forgeries of Government loan checks, embezzlement, and forgeries and complete fabrication of loan and application papers and submitting them to the Government for the purpose of obtaining the public money.

It was found that in Houston County, Ala., the loans were, for the most part, obtained upon material false representations—representations not made, as a rule, by the borrowers themselves with any intention to defraud the Government, but made by them through the procurement of banks, landowners, merchants, and other persons and concerns to whom the borrowers were heavily indebted, and with intention on the part of those procuring the applicants to get such loans to take the loans and the proceeds thereof from the applicants and apply and use them for their own benefit. Furthermore, the investigation disclosed that not only did such persons and concerns obtain such loans, but they took from the borrowers the crops raised by them and converted the crops, with the result that the Government's money was misapplied and the crops were diverted to purposes other than the repayment of the loans. The Government lost both ways.

As examples of the material false representations made in procuring the loans, the ignorant tenants and persons who were heavily indebted to those procuring them to apply the loans would, at the instigation of the other persons and concerns, sign applications stating that they, the applicants, were cash renters of the lands, whereas they were share croppers and were, at the time of making the applications, under agreement with the persons referred to whereby such persons and concerns were obligated to furnish them the supplies necessary to make the crops. The borrowers were procured to represent falsely their indebtednesses, their land ownership, their livestock holdings, their equipment, and so forth, and that they did not have, and could not procure, the necessary feed, seed, fertilizer, and so forth, for planting and growing crops, and to state that they did not have any basis for such commercial credit as would enable them to do so.

In numerous instances the prominent landowners obtained loans in their own names under representations that they did not have, and could not obtain, the necessary supplies to plant and grow crops; that they had no credit with which to obtain the same; that they had no other business than farming, and the like, notwithstanding they were under agreements with tenants or renters which relieved them from the necessity of furnishing such supplies or large parts thereof, notwithstanding they had already arranged for such supplies, notwithstanding they were engaged in business other than farming, and notwithstanding they had procured their tenants to obtain loans covering the self-same lands described in their own applications. So, then, as the loans were worked out, the object of the assistance which Congress extended and intended to extend, did not receive the benefit of the loans, and only the creditors, such as banks, merchants, fertilizer dealers, and so forth, benefited to the extent of the loans and the crops grown and upon which the Government expected to get, and thought it did get, a lien as security for the loans made.

These offenses were committed through the connivance and cooperation with landlords, banks, merchants, and so forth, by the county agent of the Department of Agriculture, who arrogated unto himself the powers, duties, and functions of all of the machinery set up by the Department of Agriculture for making the loans. In assuming and exercising these functions he acted for the county seed-loan committee by signing their names to applications as approving them; and he testified on the stand that he so approved the applications without knowledge, and without trying to find out or even caring, whether the representations in the applications were true or false.

The persons who cooperated with the county agent in these matters included not only the State circuit solicitor but attorneys and other people prominent in that county's political, social, and business life.

Shortly after it became known in southeastern Alabama that the Government was investigating fraudulent seed loans some dozen or so persons who had been guilty of misconduct and offenses in connection with such loans became apprehensive and fearful that they would be brought to account for their offenses, and some of them met one of the Government's former seed-loan collectors, who had also been guilty of offenses while serving in that capacity, and a conspiracy was formed between him and them at Augusta, Ga., for their mutual protection and the protection of their friends who were similarly situated. The agreement made between the conspirators was that the former seed-loan collector would write bogus or fictitious receipts covering and showing payment of all fraudulent loans that had been obtained, also certain items of cotton and other matters in respect of which crimes had been committed; that the bogus and fictitious receipts were not to be used by any of the persons for whom they were to be written unless and until such persons were proceeded against by the Government civilly or criminally; and that when such persons were so proceeded against they were to introduce the spurious receipts, and the former Government employee was to appear in court and testify that he had collected the money represented by the receipts and embezzled it.

In this way the local offenders were to be protected and the former Government employee was to shoulder the blame. Some time after the receipts were written pursuant to the conspiracy certain of their recipients commenced to exhibit the receipts to the Government investigating agents, and thereupon the former Government employee who had so written the receipts confessed his part in the conspiracy and later pleaded guilty to that offense and became a witness for the Government. As such witness the former employee was thoroughly corroborated in all respects as to the conspiracy.

One of the amazing things disclosed by investigations already made with reference to these loans is that gentlemen occupying high official places in the Government have been guilty of encouraging farmers to obtain these loans upon the assurance that they would never have to be repaid, and that should they get into trouble by reason of the methods resorted to in obtaining these loans that there would be plenty of avenues to escape punishment for their infraction of the law.

The persons who have been investigated and indicted and those who expect to be are prominent and influential politically, socially, and financially; they control all angles of politics and political machinery and their power of resistance to law and order is unusually strong. They have spread all manner of propaganda, their claims being, for the most part, that while they may have been guilty of technical violations of the seed-loan resolutions there has been no moral turpitude, and, they being the best citizens, there should be no punishment. They insist very loudly that the Government is persecuting them, not prosecuting; and they have exerted all manner and kinds of influence, including political influence and pressure of all grades and kinds, to prevent their prosecution and punishment.

In addition to indictments returned in the middle district of Alabama, several of the defendants were also indicted for conspiracies in South Carolina (headquarters of the Government's loan office) and for use of the mails in furtherance of schemes to defraud the Government. The principals in the conspiracy to defeat and obstruct the administration of justice were also indicted in the southern district of Georgia, where their conspiracy was hatched; and, while the Government has not as yet moved to procure their removal to either jurisdiction for trial, the defendants have exerted every influence and taken every step possible to forestall their removal. It is current gossip among the well-informed in that locality of Alabama that, if the defendants can prevent removal, they will be able to "fix" juries and defeat any further trials in their own district.

The first indictment charging 13 defendants with conspiracy to defraud the United States and obstruct the due administration of justice came on for trial at Dothan, Ala., on March 14, 1932; and, at the end of a week, the jury reported a disagreement and was discharged. It is reported that the jury stood 9 for conviction of all the defendants and 3 for acquittal of all, with the gossip current that the defendants had "fixed" those who were favorable to them. During the trial of that case there was an unprecedented parade of palpable perjury, not only by the defendants but by witnesses produced by them. It was admitted by two of the principal ones that they did meet the former Government seed-loan collector in Augusta, Ga., on the date charged by the Government and there conferred with him about certain seed-loan transactions. Also, during this trial much fabricated, false, forged, and spurious documentary evidence was introduced, including the spurious receipts written pursuant to the conspiracy as well as books and records made to support and corroborate the oral testimony given by the defendants and their witnesses. Subsequent inquiry among well-informed persons demonstrated to a moral certainty that the defendants had that jury "loaded," which bore out the oft-heard pretrial predictions that convictions could not be had because of the facility and ease with which the defendants "fix" juries.

As the result of the first mistrial a second indictment was returned which strengthened the charges against the defendants by alleging that, in said first trial, they introduced and used in evidence the fabricated and spurious receipts written pursuant to the conspiracy as one of the acts in the obstruction of justice.

The second indictment came on for trial on May 23, 1932, and, at the end of 10 days, the jury again reported its inability to agree and was discharged. Subsequently inquiry developed that one of the jurors who sat on the second trial was related, in the generic and commonly understood sense of the term, to one of the defendants, but had not truthfully answered as to that fact on his voir dire. The United States attorney filed contempt proceedings against that juror, and the matter is now under the court's consideration. As the result of the second trial, contempt proceedings were also instituted against one of the defendants for having produced and introduced in the first trial certain accounts which were shown on the second trial to have been fabricated, forged, altered, and prepared thereby for the occasion of that defendant's testimony; and, on completion of the contempt proceeding, this defendant was adjudged in contempt of the court and sentenced to one year in the county jail of Montgomery, Ala. It is worthy of note, also, that as soon as the jail sentence was pronounced by the court against this defendant for contempt, the leading Democratic paper, which backs the defendants and their political purposes, published a scathing editorial criticizing the court for the sentence, and for other things.

What has been said of Houston County, Ala., is equally true of the four or five adjoining counties where investigations have been made in part. The only difference in the situations of the several counties being that, in the counties adjoining Houston County, there is not so large a number of persons involved in the schemes to defraud the Government. In those counties larger numbers of borrowers were indebted to small numbers of persons and concerns, and as an example, when the purpose to make the loans was announced, the creditors sent out riders to, and they did, have the borrowers come in and make the applications for the loans with the intention on the part of the creditors to, and they did, confiscate the loan checks and the crops on which the Government thought that it had liens, with the result being the same as in Houston County—the creditors got the loan money and the crops and the Government lost in every way. In the adjoining counties much was done in the way of juggling and manipulating of supposed prior mortgages, so that the claim could be, and was, advanced that the Government's lien was secondary, whereas, in truth and in fact, it was but a claim of those who robbed the Government and defeated the purposes of Congress to assist the farmers.

Well-founded reports show that similar conditions exist in many counties of Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, Mississippi, and perhaps other Southern States.

In short, experience and inquiry show that the seed-loan resolutions have been prostituted to the purposes of the politicians; and that they are going to all lengths to prevent punishment of those who have violated the laws.

The situation referred to herein is appalling, and it seems there is no length to which the defendants and their supporters will not go to escape the punishment to which they are entitled and so strongly merit. Not only Congress is entitled to know this but none of its Members should lend an ear to requests for assistance from such people as are involved in these frauds. Such assistance must necessarily involve interference with the courts; and if the Government fails to carry the prosecutions to the extreme limit, it will amount to a recognition that this organization of criminals is above, and bigger than the Government itself. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, for the past several weeks I have had numerous telephone calls from Members of the House making inquiries as to the status of H. R. 8167, a bill to require Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks to accept their bonds in satisfaction of mortgages when presented by the mortgagor. This bill has been before the Banking and Currency Committee for a year or more. Recently it was reported by the committee, and is now before the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. As a member of the Committee on Rules, I remember the gentleman appearing in behalf of his bill. I suggest that if he is interested in the legislation he confer with the Speaker and the Democratic leaders in the House, because it is within their power to report out a rule and let us dispose of this matter, if the gentleman desires to have it disposed of.

Mr. HARE. I am very anxious to have it considered, and I am taking this opportunity to bring the matter to the attention of the House; and while I think perhaps the Speaker of the House and the Democratic majority floor leader might have some influence with the Rules Committee, I think the gentleman is unfair when he attempts to shift the responsibility from the committee of which he is a member to the Speaker or the floor leader of the House, because it is solely within the power of the committee to report the rule and bring it to the floor of the House, and not within the power of anyone else.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am willing to wager the gentleman that not one of the Republican members of the Committee on Rules would ever vote for a rule to bring out the gentleman's bill.

Mr. MICHENER. I have never conferred with the gentleman from New York, also a member of the Rules Committee, in reference to this matter, and he has no right to charge——

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, I am wagering.

Mr. MICHENER. He may satisfy his own imagination when he makes the assertion that the Republicans would join with him, but possibly that is not true.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman will yield, I was only hazarding a guess.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, aside from all that, the bill is before the Rules Committee, and it has not been reported. My reason for introducing the bill is this: Under existing conditions, farmers who borrowed money from land banks several years ago are now unable in many cases to repay. The bonds issued by the banks whereby money was obtained to lend to the farmer have depreciated in value. Land-bank bonds in some sections of our country are selling for 20 cents on the dollar. In other words, where a farmer borrowed $10,000 ten years ago and the bank issued $10,000 worth of bonds to obtain the money and turned it over to a farmer who gave a mortgage on his farm as security, the bonds have depreciated in value until they are worth only 20 or 25 cents on the dollar in some sections of the country.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. In a moment. Under the present situation when the farmer is unable to meet his mortgage and make the amortization payment the banks foreclose the mortgage. The land is sold, and we will say in this illustration the property brings $5,000 cash. This is turned over to the bank. The bank then goes into the market and buys $10,000 worth of bonds for $3,000 or possibly $2,500. The bank then retires the bonds and wipes out its indebtedness entirely with $2,500, and has $2,500 profit, and still has a judgment against the farmer for the difference between the $5,000 and the amount due on the mortgage. This is not fair to the borrower, and the purpose of this bill is to give the farmer the right to go into the market and buy the bonds and present them to the bank in satisfaction of his mortgage, because he should have the right to profit by the depreciation in the price of these bonds as much so as the banks. I yield now to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The bonds that are selling for 20 cents are joint-stock land-bank bonds.

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Not the Federal farm land bank?

Mr. HARE. No.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The joint-stock land banks are semi-private institutions and ought not to have been organized.

Mr. HARE. Well, that is not a question to be argued to-day. They were organized and they loaned money to the farmers. They may have served a good purpose in their day. Their bonds have depreciated in value, and I think the farmers should have as much right to profit by the depreciation as the banks, and the purpose of this bill is to give them that right. Several Members within the last 10 days have telephoned my office inquiring as to the status of the bill. Consequently I felt there must be considerable interest in the proposed legislation. Borrowers from various sections of the country are inquiring almost daily as to the status of the bill, and I thought I should give information to the House that the bill has been recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and is now before the Rules Committee. If we are to remain in session anything like two or three days or a week, I think the committee should report the bill and give the House an opportunity to pass on it, because it will give thousands of farmers in this country an opportunity to take advantage of the depreciation in the value of bonds and redeem their farms upon the same conditions and upon the same terms that the banking institutions are relieving themselves of their liability. In other words, if the banks are permitted to buy their own bonds at 25 cents on the dollar and retire their obligations, I think the farmer ought to have the same right, because it is no injustice to the bank when a borrower offers to relieve the bank of its obligation in satisfaction of his obligation to the bank. No harm has been done. No one has been injured except the bondholder, and he is not required to sell it unless he so desires.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. The gentleman well knows I have been in sympathy with his proposition, but, as the bill came out of committee, was it amended so that the interest payments were to be paid in cash and not in bonds?

Mr. HARE. I appreciate the interest the gentleman has manifested in this piece of legislation. The committee amended the bill to provide that the amortization installments must be paid in cash.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. And the interest on the loan?

Mr. HARE. Yes; the interest on the loan as well. But under the provisions of the bill bonds may be presented in satisfaction of the mortgage.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. That is, of the principal?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Are any of the national farm organizations supporting or sponsoring the gentleman's bill?

Mr. HARE. I am not certain, but I think so.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then that bill will come within the scope of the farm-relief plank of the Democratic platform, because it favors every kind of legislation which the farm organizations are for, whether it costs $5,000,000,000 or $10,000,000,000 or $25,000,000,000, except that it must meet the requirement that it is constitutional.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina one additional minute.

Mr. HARE. I have had a number of inquiries from the gentleman's State of Wisconsin urging and insisting upon the passage of this bill; and should it become law, I am satisfied that the farmers of Wisconsin will appreciate any interest the gentleman from Wisconsin may have taken in its behalf.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Wisconsin comes from a city district, but he has supported much farm legislation; and if the gentleman will get the Democratic majority to bring the bill out, I assure the gentleman that the gentleman from Wisconsin will give deep and sympathetic consideration to it with a view to supporting it if he can.

Mr. HARE. Of course I appreciate the sympathy and support of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question of farm relief and also to extend my remarks on the question of the tariff.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

FARM RELIEF LEGISLATION

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I understand that my opponent is making an issue of the fact that I voted for the present farm marketing act. This is, indeed, interesting.

Especially is this true when you consider that this was the outstanding plank in the Republican platform of 1928. It may be that he has forgotten this. There can be no mistake as to this declaration, which is as follows:

The Republican Party pledges itself to the enactment of legislation creating a Federal Farm Board with the necessary powers to promote the establishment of a farm-marketing system of farmer-owned and controlled stabilization corporations or associations to prevent and control surpluses through orderly distribution.

Mr. Hoover, the Republican candidate for President, made many speeches during the campaign of 1928 similar to the one made by him October 6 of that year at Elizabethton, Tenn., when he said:

We stand specifically pledged to create a Federal Farm Board of men sympathetic with the problem, to be clothed with powers and resources with which not only to further aid farmers' cooperatives and assist generally in solving the multitude of different farm problems which arise from all quarters of our Nation, but in particular to build up, with initial advances of capital from the Government, farmer-owned and farmer-controlled stabilization corporations which will protect the farmer from depressions and the demoralization of summer and periodic surpluses. Such an instrumentality should be able to develop, as years go on, the constructive measures necessary to solve the farmers' new problems that will inevitably arise. It is no proposal of subsidy or fee or tax upon the farmer. It is a proposal to assist the farmer onto his own feet into control of his own destinies. This is not a theoretic formula. It is a business proposition designed to make farming more profitable.

I assume that my opponent supported Mr. Hoover for President, notwithstanding he was running upon that platform and made many speeches like the one just quoted. If he did support him, I can not understand just why he, as a Republican, is finding fault with me at this time for having voted for the measure his platform and his candidate for President so strongly advocated.

The voters by an overwhelming majority elected Mr. Hoover. By that act they said, in effect, "We have confidence in him that he can and will do what he says regarding agriculture." In view of this, and the further fact that all farm organizations throughout the country indorsed the plan of the farm marketing act, there was but one thing for a Representative from an agricultural State to do and that was to give the President an opportunity to carry out the promise he made the voters, and that is what was done almost unanimously in both branches of Congress. No one, at this late date, can consistently criticize a Representative in Congress for having voted for this measure under the circumstances, and least of all a supporter of Mr. Hoover in the 1928 campaign for President. I can say with all emphasis that it was not my bill nor one that I wanted. It was President Hoover's measure and passed just as he dictated. As evidence of that fact I call attention to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 27th of last June, of a running debate in the United States Senate in which the farm marketing act was involved, at which time Senator LA FOLLETTE said:

Mr. President, I want to make a brief statement for the record. It was stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and now it has been repeated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] that the Farm Board bill was framed by Congress. I do not think that is historically accurate. The bill was written by the President of the United States and it was jammed through the Congress because all of the farm organizations and Senators who have worked upon farm-relief problems became convinced that it was the only measure that would receive the approval of the President of the United States.

I repeat, I was not for the farm marketing act as it was passed but was willing and anxious for the President to have a fair chance to see what could be done with his "business proposition designed to make farming more profitable."

In a speech made by me on July 3, 1930, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 12487 to 12491, inclusive, on the condition of agriculture after more than a year of the farm marketing act and the Federal Farm Board I said:

I supported—that is, I voted for—this measure, as did almost every Member in both branches of Congress. There was nothing else to do except vote for it and then trust that the President, who was so confident that his plan was not a theoretic formula but a business proposition designed to make farming more profitable was right. It has been in effect for more than a year. The Farm Board has been given $500,000,000 in that time to demonstrate to the world, and more especially to the sorely depressed farmer, that it is not a theoretic formula but a business proposition to make farming more profitable.

The question is, Has it done it? Has it even made a favorable impression? The result so far is the best answer. We have a statement made recently by Mr. Hyde, Secretary of Agriculture and a member of the Farm Board, that for the next seven years the price of grain will be lower than it has been in the past seven years. This certainly is a tragic manner in which to inform the farmer that he need not expect much encouragement from the Farm Board. The Good Book relates how a young man by the name of Joseph interpreted a king's dream to mean that there would be seven years of great plenty to be followed by seven lean years. We now have a new interpretation which gives only the seven lean years.

At the time this bill was being considered it was distinctly understood that it was solely an administration measure, and no attempt was made to change it in the least. It provides many things: First, to prevent and control exportable surpluses of agricultural products; second, to establish the market for farm products; third, to give the farmer a price which would insure a reasonable wage above the costs of production; fourth, to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with labor and industry; and, fifth, to extend to the farmer the benefits of the American tariff system. As already stated, it has had over a year's trial with an enormous amount of money at its command, and I am endeavoring to find how many of these five propositions it has accomplished.

It certainly will not be claimed that it has disposed of the agricultural surplus. Nor has it stabilized the market. Who among its most ardent supporters will contend that it has given the farmer a fair price for his product? Does anyone claim that it has given agriculture equality with industry? And, last, how has it extended to the farmer the benefit of the tariff? The present tariff measure has erected a wall so high as to make it impossible for the foreigner to bring his wares into this country, sell them, and with the money received buy some of our surplus farm products and take back with him, and thus has destroyed what foreign markets he did have.

The only method so far advanced by the Farm Board is for the farmer to produce less. In the past the farmer has had to battle with the elements. When he planted a crop he did not know whether there would be floods or drought to destroy it. And now here is an additional proposition that he must face; that is, the edict of the farm marketing board to plant less, decrease his acreage, or else for the next seven years the price of grain will be lower than it has been for the past seven years. Why is it necessary for this great board to have $500,000,000 out of the United States Treasury to enable it to give such information and advice to the farmer?

That speech described my thought of the farm marketing act and the Federal Farm Board over two years ago.

Ever since making that speech I have felt that the President and his Farm Board have had ample time to demonstrate whether or not the farm marketing act was, as he said—"This is not a theoretic formula, it is a business proposition designed to make farming more profitable." I have stood ready to vote whenever the opportunity was offered for one of the many measures that have been introduced to repeal the act and abolish the board. It is another one of those expensive experiments, and should be abolished. This, however, can not be done under the present administration, but without doubt will be done under the next administration, for, in his speech of acceptance a few days ago Mr. Roosevelt said:

We should repeal immediately those provisions of law that compel the Federal Government to go into the market to purchase, to sell, to speculate in farm products in a futile attempt to reduce farm surpluses.

I can say that I am in entire agreement with that statement. I am ready and anxious to help make effective that emphatic declaration.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, on the 17th of June the House had under consideration House Resolution 247, which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States does hereby approve and encourage the efforts which have been made to hold an international economic conference to be participated in by as many countries as may be willing to send representatives for the purpose of considering methods for the improvement of general economic and monetary conditions.

Several gentlemen spoke on that resolution, including myself. I said on that occasion that I had no confidence whatever that anything would be accomplished in the case of silver and monetary conditions by the international conference. My reason for that statement was, and is, that I think the countries of Europe have a different interest in the price level than has the United States of America.

It is my belief that the United States of America must have a higher price level for bulky commodities, at least, than is required in European countries, including England.

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, upon which I have the honor to serve, has thoroughly investigated during this session of Congress the question of silver, or, as it is otherwise expressed, the effect of the low price of silver.

I never was interested in silver. In fact I do remember the campaign of Mr. Bryan in 1896, but if I knew anything about silver at that time I had forgotten it, and, as I say, I was not interested in the question of silver until it was my honor to be upon the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and a subcommittee thereof. I may say to the House that the effect upon economics that silver has had in the world is a revelation to me, because of the debasing of silver by European countries, and also the effect that resulted from the British Government taking India off of the gold-exchange basis and putting India upon the gold-bullion basis, and in order to do that selling some four or five hundred million ounces of silver. To my mind these things had tremendous effect in precipitating the debacle we had in this country in 1929.

I arise here this afternoon because it seems to me we are going to get nowhere on this international economic conference, and I do not regret if we do not get anywhere. As I said, I have not any confidence in this economic conference anyway. The other night I was reading the proceedings of the Senate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 29, 1932. On that date there had been a communication sent to the Senate from the President of the United States asking for an appropriation of $40,000 to cover the expenses of an international economic conference to be held in London during the year 1932. This was pursuant to a communication by the Director of the Budget, Mr. J. Clawson Roop, who communicated the information that an appropriation of this amount would be necessary for our participation in the conference.

In the Seventy-first Congress the President was authorized to call an international monetary conference, the object of which was to consider the question of silver. The President has never called this economic conference.

To explain his position we called before our committee Mr. Charles Grafton Rogers, an Assistant Secretary of State, and he went over the matter to the satisfaction, I think, of our committee, that the State Department under the direction of the President of the United States had been watching this matter throughout the world; that they were ready, whenever the nations of the world were ready to participate, to call a conference or to participate in a conference that might be called by any other nation. So I am not finding any particular fault with the President of the United States because the conference has never been called up to this time. However, the Senate, on the 29th of June, passed an amendment to an appropriation bill it had under consideration on that day, an amendment offered by Senator ODDIE, and I want to read the amendment to you as it was adopted by the Senate:

> For the expenses of participation by the United States in a monetary conference, including silver, to be held during the year 1932, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, including transportation—

And so forth.

The point is, that the British Government, through its Premier, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, issued an invitation to this Government, as well as other governments, to participate in an international economic conference to investigate the price of commodities as well as monetary conditions. As I understand, the appropriation as provided for under this authorization passed by the Senate will not permit us to participate in the general economic conference that may be held in London, because this provides specifically for a monetary conference to include the question of silver. As I say, I am not disappointed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman has failed to indicate the date of the conference that is to be called by Ramsay MacDonald.

Mr. FIESINGER. I do not think the date has been set. I think there was a communication between the governments, but the date has not been set as yet.

Mr. SABATH. But it is this year.

Mr. FIESINGER. It is this year, but I do not think the date has been set as yet. There have been communications between the two governments, but no date has yet been set.

Mr. BRITTEN. The remarkable thing about the amendment adopted on the other side of the Capitol was that it provided for an expenditure of $40,000 for something that did not exist.

Mr. FIESINGER. That is absolutely right.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. As a matter of fact, has it not been stated that the reason why the President has not called this conference on silver is that Great Britain has, through diplomatic channels, expressed a desire not to be invited at this time?

Mr. FIESINGER. I would not state it exactly that way. As it was expressed to us, our State Department communicated with Great Britain and she has never shown any interest in accepting such an invitation, although she has never refused an invitation. She has let it lie on the table, so to speak.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does not the gentleman feel the question is of such magnitude that the President should call the conference whether Great Britain attends or not?

Mr. FIESINGER. Absolutely.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I was interested in the gentleman's statement with reference to the appropriation of $40,000, which was confined to a monetary conference. In view of the fact that the House has not authorized the President to participate in this conference, is it the gentleman's judgment that we can now participate in that conference?

Mr. FIESINGER. I do not think we can, because the Senate provided for our participation in a monetary conference to include the question of silver, whereas the proposition we were talking about was an international economic conference. That is my view about it, though I may be mistaken.

Mr. HOUSTON of Delaware. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON of Delaware. The President asked an appropriation for an economic conference, did he not?

Mr. FIESINGER. Just so.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. FIESINGER. I want to say that when I addressed the House on June 17 I said it was my notion that, irrespective of any other government, the United States should itself have a silver policy. The report of our committee to Congress under date of May 14 contains these statements. I quote as follows:

> Our investigation has revealed that certain European nations, in an effort to protect their manufacturing industries by affording a better cost basis through lower prices of raw materials and foodstuffs, suddenly and either inadvertently and unintentionally or quite deliberately depressed the world commodity price levels below the point that admits of any profit to the American producer. We find that this result has followed directly and definitely from certain governmental acts, the effects of which are clearly traceable, so that all the important facts are well sustained by the evidence we have gathered. * * *

It is recognized that some nations may not desire to participate in such a conference for reasons regarded by themselves as adequate. We feel, nevertheless, that such nations as do desire to participate in the effort to improve the situation should have the opportunity to do so and we believe they are sufficient in number and importance to assure substantial and beneficial results.

We recommend, therefore, that the President of the United States immediately issue a call for a conference of all nations interested in the restoration of the commodity price level through the stabilization of the international exchanges by restoring the equilibrium in the metallic bases of the money systems or otherwise; such conference to be held at the earliest possible date and in such city as the President may designate.

This is an entirely different kind of a conference from that which has been proposed by Great Britain.

I want to reiterate, therefore, what I said on the 17th of June, that our committee is in favor of our adopting an American plan and an American program as to this silver and monetary problem and that our committee is in favor of keeping the gold standard. We are in favor of extending the monetary reserves of the country by including silver at the gold price of silver. As I have stated before, we believe in sound money, and we can evolve a plan which can accomplish these things without reference to international conferences among nations whose interests are opposed to what we are trying to accomplish. When I addressed the House on June 17 I said the committee was about to take some very important steps to accomplish that end, namely, that the United States establish a policy with reference to silver. On the old theory of bimetallism a world agreement is necessary, but on the gold standard basis for measuring the silver values we can act alone.

The committee, through the chairman, Mr. SOMERS of New York, is introducing a bill to-day to cover the matter of a policy with reference to silver so far as the United States is concerned. We will later invite the nations that are similarly interested to participate with us in a conference which we may call in this country. But for us to continue to permit our policy to be fixed for us by other nations is no longer necessary. Under the plan we have to submit we can act alone. I invite all of the Members of this House on both sides of the Chamber to read and study this bill and give us the benefit of your criticism.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. While those interested in this proposed monetary conference lay great stress upon the desire of the conference to stabilize currency, is it not a fact that the thing they desire to stabilize is the price of silver?

Mr. FIESINGER. No, sir. The object in view is to raise up and stabilize commodity prices. I am not interested in silver as such, but I want commodity prices to be raised so that the people who produce commodities can pay their debts and make a profit on what they produce and give employment to the unemployed. [Applause.]

Let me conclude by throwing a little more light on just what I mean by that statement. After the war European countries debased their subsidiary silver coinage and sold the silver resulting from the debasement. England put India upon a gold-bullion basis, and in order to accomplish that object sold, or offered for sale, silver; the French put Indio-China upon a gold basis. These various acts had the effect of destroying more than $2,000,000,000 of primary world money, thus putting a strain upon gold which greatly damaged and weakened the confidence of the credit structure of gold-standard countries. The effect of these things, moreover, has deprived the Orient of purchasing power, as well as gold-standard countries, to an extent that if it were not so would make a demand for commodities that would lift the price level, thus relieving the world of the economic pressure that it is suffering under; make business profitable; provide a profitable market for our farm products, to wit, wheat and cotton, and so forth; and give employment to vast numbers of unemployed.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, Congress recently passed House Joint Resolution 461, authorizing the Federal Farm Board to turn over to the American Red Cross 45,000,000 bushels of wheat and 500,000 bales of cotton for distribution to the destitute people of this country. For the purpose of providing funds for putting that resolution into effect, the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, in charge of deficiency appropriations, conducted hearings on the matter, and we had before the committee Mr. James C. Stone, the chairman of the Federal Farm Board, and we made quite an extensive inquiry of him into the activities of that board. Owing to the widespread lack of information and large amount of misinformation on this matter, I feel that the questions of the various members of that subcommittee and his answers thereto, and the information brought out, is important to the agricultural interests of this country. And for that reason, under the permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting that hearing herewith, as follows:

DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED WHEAT AND COTTON

(Hearings conducted by the subcommittee, Messrs. JOSEPH W. BYRNS (chairman), JAMES P. BUCHANAN, EDWARD T. TAYLOR, WILLIAM A. AYRES, WILLIAM W. ARNOLD, ROSS A. COLLINS, WILLIAM R. WOOD, EDWARD H. WASON, FRANK MURPHY, and GUY U. HARDY, of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, in charge of deficiency appropriations, Wednesday, July 6, 1932.)

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES C. STONE, CHAIRMAN FEDERAL FARM BOARD

Indefinite appropriation for distribution of wheat and cotton

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Stone, the subcommittee has before it an estimate of the President requesting what might be called an indefinite appropriation to enable the Farm Board, of which you are the chairman, to comply with the law directing the turning over of 45,000,000 bushels of wheat and 500,000 bales of cotton to the Red Cross.

There are really three indefinite appropriations involved, as set forth in the law and also in the report of the Bureau of the Budget as transmitted to Congress by the President. They are found in subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) of section 3 of the public resolution referred to.

We would like to have you tell the subcommittee just why this is needed in the first place, and why it is necessary to make an indefinite appropriation rather than a fixed charge on the Treasury, and any other facts you want to present to the committee.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I knew what you wanted with me this morning and I dictated a statement, which I should like to read to you, and then I shall be glad to answer any questions any of you gentlemen want to ask me in regard to this.

The CHAIRMAN. We shall be glad to hear your statement.

Mr. STONE. H. J. Res. 418 directs the Farm Board to deliver 45,000,000 bushels of wheat of the Grain Stabilization Corporation and 500,000 bales of cotton of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation to the American Red Cross or any other organization designated by it, on July 1, 1932, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, and further authorizes appropriation to be made covering—

"(a) Advances to repay loans held by commercial or intermediate credit banks.

"(b) Reimbursing the stabilization corporations for their net equity in the wheat or cotton used for donations at the current market value at the time of the donations.

"(c) Carrying and handling changes between the date of the approval of the resolution and delivery of the wheat or cotton."

There is also a provision which reads as follows:

"Such wheat or cotton shall be delivered upon application therefor, but only upon the approval of the President of the United States, and in such amounts to each organization as the President may approve."

It is obvious that two uncertainties exist:

(1) When the wheat or cotton will be delivered.

(2) The value of the wheat or cotton at the time of delivery.

So far as the first uncertainty is concerned, our best judgment is that if deliveries are started immediately that it would take not less than three months to complete same, because of the volume involved. It is necessary for the Red Cross to make arrangements for the spinning or exchange of the cotton, and, of course, place and time of delivery and quality of cotton desired will depend on the goods into which it is to be spun and the mills which are to spin it. In the case of the wheat, the same uncertainties exist as to the use to be made and as to point of delivery.

It may be that the Red Cross or other accepting organization will take the position that the wheat or cotton shall be delivered to them only when they apply therefor and they may put off the time when application will be made from days to months.

Referring to the second proposition, as to the value of the wheat or cotton at the time of delivery, the obvious uncertainty which exists from it is as to what the value of the wheat or cotton will then be. It may go up or down.

Further, there must be taken into consideration the present impossibility of determining the value at to-day's market of the wheat or cotton which is to be delivered. The committee will understand that cash wheat or spot cotton is not sold at a definite fixed price but that the price varies in accordance with the location, the grade, and the demand at the particular time that the commodity is sold. At the present time, in the Northwest, high premiums are paid for protein wheat which brings to the holder thereof prices many cents in excess of the Chicago quotations. Cotton also has premiums, known as basis, for the different staples and qualities. It will be impossible to accurately determine the market values of the commodities delivered under this resolution until it is known what commodities, at what place, and what qualities are actually delivered.

In order that the Federal Farm Board may be in a position to carry out the mandate of Congress for delivery of these commodities to the suffering when needed, it is, in our judgment, advisable to make an appropriation indefinite in amount, couched in such language as will require the expenditure of the funds solely for the purpose specified in the resolution. Such indefinite appropriations are justified by precedent in instances where Congress has been confronted with the same uncertainty as to the amount required. An illustration of such indefinite appropriations is one made as a part of—

"Joint resolution authorizing the President to ascertain, adjust, and pay certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920, as per a certain contract authorized by the President. Approved February 4, 1929. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 45, p. 1148.)"

After making certain recitals, this resolution reads as follows:

"Resolved, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to ascertain the amount due on said claims, if any, and he is further authorized to settle and adjust said claims, and to certify same to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment to the several persons entitled thereto as their respective interests may appear, together with the reasonable and necessary expenses incident to the administration of this resolution, out of any funds now in the hands of the United States Grain Corporation and belonging to the United States, or out of the funds in the United States Treasury, not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That attorneys' fees shall not exceed 15 per cent of the amount recovered."

Other illustrations are found in United States Code Annotated, title 31, section 711; title 46, section 748.

Gentlemen, that just about covers the situation, I think, as briefly as I can put it. In my opinion, it would be impossible for you or anyone else to determine to-day just how much money this is going to take.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it possible to make an estimate, Mr. Stone?

Mr. STONE. Well, it is possible to make an estimate, Mr. Chairman; but, take cotton: To make an estimate on cotton, you would have to know the kind of cotton that they wanted to give away, the staple, the grade, the location, and all of those things that enter into the definite price. Of course, I could get those figures for you, if you would specify particular grades of cotton or particular locations. If you did that, I could figure out about how much it would be to-day.

Mr. WOOD. It would depend upon the requisition made by the Red Cross, would it not, as to the number of bushels of wheat that would be required and the number of bales of cotton?

Mr. STONE. That is right.

Estimated cost of wheat and cotton to be distributed

Mr. WOOD. Has any survey been made by the Red Cross or any of its agencies looking to the ascertainment of those facts?

Mr. STONE. Not that I know of, Mr. WOOD.

Mr. WOOD. Suppose this appropriation is made, what will be the machinery that will be put in motion then? Will these products be given out upon requisitions made by the Red Cross from time to time?

Mr. STONE. It will be upon requisitions made, if I understand it correctly, by the Red Cross and approved by the President and delivered to the Farm Board. We will then direct the stabilization corporations to deliver the wheat and cotton to the Red Cross.

Mr. WOOD. Has there been any thought as to a limitation of time during which this might run? Or is it going to run forever?

Mr. STONE. No. I think it runs to July, 1933, if I understand the resolution correctly.

Mr. TAYLOR. This investigation that you mentioned as being necessary—is that going to delay things for six or eight months before anything is done?

Mr. STONE. No; that will not delay the delivery of the wheat or cotton a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. You said something about three months; I do not recall exactly what it was.

Mr. STONE. I said that if we were to start to deliver all of it now, it would take that long to make the actual delivery.

Mr. WOOD. Suppose that 45,000,000 bushels of wheat were called for to-day or within the next month, let us say, and 500,000 bales of cotton at present prices; how much money would that involve?

Mr. STONE. As I have just tried to explain to the chairman, Mr. WOOD, that would depend entirely upon the grade and staple of cotton that they demanded, and also the grade of wheat and the location.

Mr. WOOD. You have some general knowledge as to the average of those things, have you not?

Mr. STONE. If you take the average as of the present time, take the average run of cotton and the average run of wheat, it would amount to something between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000. That is, if it could be delivered immediately.

Mr. WOOD. For both of those items?

Mr. STONE. Yes. But you can not figure it that way. It may be below that, it may be considerably above that, depending entirely upon the location of the wheat, the kind and character of cotton that they demand and the location of it.

Mr. WOOD. Have you any information from which you can conclude whether or not this entire amount will eventually be called for?

Mr. STONE. No, I have not; I do not know. Judging from the way the first 40,000,000 bushels of wheat that was given away has been taken by the Red Cross, I would imagine that all of this 45,000,000 bushels will be taken. We have no precedent in relation to cotton to go by.

The CHAIRMAN. This authorization provides, as you have just stated, for the payment of the loan, in the first place, and then the cost of handling. Could you give the committee any idea of the amount of the loan?

Mr. STONE. You mean of the primary loans?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; in other words, that appropriation covered by subdivision (a)?

Mr. STONE. Yes. The primary loans on wheat amount to $50,000,000. Some of these loans have been falling due recently, and some of them have been paid off; just what the net amount now is, Mr. Chairman, I do not know. I can get that information for you, if you want it.

The CHAIRMAN. I was asking simply for an approximate amount.

Mr. STONE. The loans on cotton will run from $18 to $20 a bale, and on wheat 35 to 37 cents per bushel.

Amount of wheat and cotton held by Federal Farm Board

Mr. WOOD. How much wheat has the Federal Farm Board now?

Mr. STONE. We will have, of actual cash wheat, after this 45,000,000 bushels is given to the Red Cross, approximately 28,000,000 bushels.

Mr. WOOD. And how much cotton?

Mr. STONE. We have 1,300,000 bales of cotton in the stabilization cotton holdings; 500,000 bales from that would leave 800,000 bales.

Mr. WOOD. In your opinion, will this have any effect on the market?

Mr. STONE. I do not know; but I do not think it would to any degree.

Mr. WOOD. If the surplus is reduced, is not the tendency for the price of commodities to rise?

Mr. STONE. Yes; I think possibly it may have that effect later. It may be possible that the remaining 28,000,000 bushels of the stabilization wheat can be sold to foreign countries.

Sales of wheat to foreign countries

Mr. WOOD. Are we selling any wheat now to foreign countries?

Mr. STONE. Some. The demand was very good in the export trade during April, May, and June.

Mr. WOOD. Are we making any special effort to sell our wheat abroad?

Mr. STONE. It has been unwise, Mr. WOOD, in my opinion, to try to push the sale above the normal demand; but we have been doing everything we could to sell in the normal channels of trade in export and have been quite successful with it.

Mr. ARNOLD. Am I right in this, that this takes the wheat and cotton off the hands of the Farm Board to the actual amount that the Farm Board has in it?

Mr. STONE. No. That is all based on the actual market price of wheat and cotton at the time of delivery.

Mr. ARNOLD. We will first have to pay off the indebtedness against the wheat that we have got.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. And then pay off whatever equity the Farm Board has in that?

Mr. STONE. If I understand it correctly, Mr. Congressman, what the Government pays for this wheat and cotton that is given away is based on the price of the wheat and cotton at the time it is delivered to the Red Cross.

Mr. ARNOLD. And it has no reference to the amount that the Farm Board paid for the wheat?

Mr. STONE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, it amounts just to a purchase of the wheat?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. At the market price.

Mr. STONE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. What effect is that going to have, in your opinion, Mr. Stone, if you care to express an opinion on it, on the price of wheat that will be in the hands of the farmers this year?

Mr. STONE. I do not see that it will have any effect. It may have some little effect, but I do not think so. I think that if we could get rid of this balance of 28,000,000 bushels of wheat, into export trade, that would have a strengthening influence on the market.

Mr. TAYLOR. What countries have been buying some of this wheat from us?

Mr. STONE. You can not always tell; but France and England and some other continental countries have been buying wheat.

Mr. TAYLOR. Do they actually pay us for it in real money?

Mr. STONE. Yes; we sold seven and a half million bushels to Germany, some six or eight months ago, on 3-year time. We also sold 15,000,000 bushels of wheat to China.

I want to impress on you gentlemen that this is a most important appropriation from our point of view, because if it is not made, we can not deliver the wheat under the resolution.

Inability to estimate amount of appropriation required

Mr. TAYLOR. Can you give this committee any idea as to how much money is going to be needed, if we give your board this carte blanche authorization to spend all you want to?

Mr. STONE. I have just answered that question for Mr. WOOD, but the statement I have just made expresses my views on it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not understand just how much money we may obligate the Government to pay out in cash.

Mr. STONE. That is a question that I am unable to answer.

Mr. TAYLOR. Can you not give us the slightest idea, or conception, of what amount it will be?

Mr. STONE. If you were to take this wheat and cotton to-day on the average grade, quality, and staple, at the present price of both wheat and cotton, the amount of money involved would range between, I should say, $40,000,000 and $50,000,000. If the price of cotton or wheat goes up, it will be more. If the period of time over which they take it is a long one, it will be more.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the passage of this resolution give you the authority to spend that amount of money?

Mr. STONE. We do not spend a cent. This is one time when we are not spending anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The first requirement set out in the law is to pay the loan made by the Farm Board to these stabilization corporations, which consist of farmers.

Mr. STONE. Consist of what?

The CHAIRMAN. Farmers, do they not?

Mr. STONE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. What do they consist of?

Mr. STONE. That refers to the primary loans that have been gotten on this wheat and cotton through commercial banks and intermediate-credit banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The first thing done would be to pay them off, if the price is sufficient to do that.

Mr. STONE. I don't think, Mr. Chairman, that has anything to do with the appropriation. If I understand the resolution correctly, all that the Farm Board gets for this wheat is the market price at the time of delivery to the Red Cross.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, there would be no money paid into the coffers of the Farm Board at all.

Mr. STONE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. All that this appropriation will be used for is to pay the loans.

Mr. STONE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And the cost of handling, and then if there is any equity——

Mr. STONE. If there is any equity, we get it; and that will be small, in my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. You get it; and suppose there is an equity in considerable sum?

Mr. STONE. That goes back into our revolving fund.

The CHAIRMAN. That goes back into your revolving fund to be used just as you have used the money that has been heretofore appropriated?

Mr. STONE. That is correct.

Mr. WOOD. If you gave the Red Cross 10,000,000 bushels of wheat to-day, under the terms of this resolution, if the appropriation is made, you would be reimbursed into your revolving fund by the amount of the market price of that wheat.

Mr. STONE. That is right. We would then take that money and pay off the bank loans on the wheat.

Mr. WOOD. The net result of all this would be that the Government would simply give away whatever amount it becomes necessary to give away in order to meet the demands of the Red Cross under this resolution.

Mr. STONE. That is right, and no more than that.

Mr. ARNOLD. All the loans would not be retired out of this appropriation; just the loans covering the wheat and cotton that is sold.

Mr. STONE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that it is impossible to even roughly estimate how much money will be required?

Mr. STONE. It is, because of the reasons that I have just stated here to you.

Receipts from sale of wheat to be used for payment of primary loans

Mr. WOOD. Suppose the 45,000,000 bushels of wheat were given to the Red Cross by you to be distributed by them. Then would you take this money that you would derive from the transaction and replace with it the same number of bushels of wheat in your reserve?

Mr. STONE. No.

Mr. ARNOLD. You mean to say you have gone out of the market?

Mr. STONE. We have not been in for about a year.

Mr. WOOD. This is perhaps far afield, but I would like to ask you, Mr. Stone, how do you determine when you are going to buy wheat? You have bought up the wheat that makes this surplus now. You have bought that wheat from time to time. Will you or will you not determine in the future to buy up more wheat?

Mr. STONE. We can not do that, because we have not the money with which to do it, Mr. WOOD.

Mr. WOOD. But if you get this money, this $45,000,000, which the Government will have to pay for this wheat for the Red Cross, you will have that amount of money in your revolving fund and you could buy wheat with that, could you not?

Mr. STONE. No. We have got to pay these primary loans that are on the wheat now.

Loss by Federal Farm Board in wheat and cotton operations

Mr. WOOD. What is the amount of your debt to-day?

Mr. STONE. It runs around 35 to 37 cents a bushel on this wheat, I think; probably a little more than that, and about $18 to $20 a bale on cotton.

Mr. WOOD. What has been the total loss in the operations of the Farm Board on wheat and cotton?

Mr. STONE. That can not be accurately determined until we wind up the business and sell all of the wheat and cotton.

Mr. WOOD. Suppose you closed your books to-day and struck a balance. What would that loss be?

Mr. STONE. I could not tell you that offhand, but I can get you the figures, if you wish.

Mr. TAYLOR. It seems to me it would be a good idea to have those figures put in the record of this hearing. I think this committee ought to know how we stand, at least approximately. I am sure the Congress would also like to know.

Mr. Stone. You can get that now, gentlemen, from the hearings before the Senate Agricultural Committee as of last November. They asked us to make all of those estimates at that time, and it is a matter of record in those hearings.

Mr. TAYLOR. We have not the time to read all of those hearings, but we would like that information in these hearings. This committee has been and will be asked a great many questions about the activities of your board.

Mr. STONE. It is in a very brief statement.

Mr. WOOD. The situation differs to-day from what it was then?

Mr. STONE. Yes; to some extent.

Mr. WOOD. You have been losing money since then, have you not?

Mr. STONE. Yes; to some extent that is true.

Information recently compiled for the Senate Agricultural Committee, and not yet made public, shows estimated costs of stabilization operations as follows:

Deficit in cotton stabilization operations, at market values of Mar. 31, 1932	$82,109,000
Deficit in wheat stabilization operations, at market values of Mar. 31, 1932	144,518,000
Net estimated deficit	226,627,000

You asked, though, Mr. WOOD, on what we based our conclusions as to when we should buy wheat. I might state to you briefly just what we were confronted with in November, 1930, when we began to buy wheat actively. It was on the 15th of November, 1930.

Mr. ARNOLD (interposing). May I ask this, Mr. Stone? Is the stuff you have in storage deteriorating to any extent?

Mr. STONE. No; it has not deteriorated. We have had this wheat inspected at stated intervals by the Department of Agriculture. The last inspection was made a couple of months ago and they found approximately 99 per cent of it in good millable condition.

Mr. ARNOLD. There was something of a flurry over here in Baltimore some time ago to the effect that there was great deterioration?

Mr. STONE. There was absolutely nothing to that; not a thing in the world. That was reported by a man who was connected with the Baltimore Chamber of Commerce. The Red Cross immediately had their own inspectors go over and inspect this flour. The Department of Agriculture had their man inspect it, and there was another inspection made by parties in Baltimore, and they found the flour in good condition.

Mr. ARNOLD. And there is no deterioration at all of the wheat or the cotton?

Mr. STONE. No; as long as it is in good storage.

But to continue with the statement that I started to make in answer to Mr. WOOD's question. We were confronted at that time with 60 bank failures the day before in Arkansas. The National Bank of Kentucky, in Louisville, with $60,000,000 resources, closed. There were four or five banks in that territory that closed in sympathy with the closing of the National Bank of Kentucky. There were about 12 bank failures in North Carolina. There were 5 or 6 bank failures in southern Illinois and about 6 or 7 bank failures in Iowa, and there was a very persistent rumor that 2 of the largest banking institutions in this country were in trouble.

In addition to that, we knew of from thirty to forty million bushels of wheat on which loans had been obtained from commercial and intermediate-credit banks, that, if the market were to go 2 cents a bushel lower, would have been thrown on the market. The price at that time was around 69 cents a bushel in Chicago. We felt that if that happened wheat prices in Chicago probably would go below 50 cents a bushel within 10 days after that wheat was thrown on the market. That is when we began to buy wheat and stabilize the price.

We stabilized the price from the 15th day of November, 1930, until the 5th day of June, 1931, at 81 cents May Chicago. If any wheat brought above that, somebody else bought it. If any wheat sold below that, or at 81 cents, the Grain Stabilization Corporation bought it. During that period the price was stabilized at 81 cents a bushel.

Mr. WOOD. How much?

Mr. STONE. Eighty-one cents a bushel, May Chicago.

Mr. WOOD. How is it, then, that the farmers throughout our section of the country were getting less than 45 cents a bushel for their wheat?

Mr. STONE. Some of that difference may be in the difference between the terminal price and the local elevator price, which is based, say, on Chicago less the expense of getting it from that local elevator to Chicago. But during that period I do not think you had any wheat in Indiana which sold as low as 45 cents.

Mr. WOOD. I think we did. I think it sold as low as 39 cents.

Mr. STONE. That was after June the 5th.

Mr. WOOD. It might have been.

Mr. STONE. We could not continue that operation indefinitely because you can not continue any operation of buying and not selling unless you have unlimited funds. Since that time we have bought no wheat; that is, the Grain Stabilization Corporation has bought no wheat for stabilization purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is the situation concerning cotton substantially the same?

Mr. STONE. What is that?

Mr. TAYLOR. What were your activities concerning cotton?

Mr. STONE. The Cotton Stabilization Corporation has not bought any cotton since 1930, nor have we sold any of the stabilization cotton since September, 1930, and we have not sold it for the simple reason that we did not want that cotton to compete against the crops that were coming along in the hands of the grower. And I want to say to you frankly, gentlemen, this is the first operation I have ever gotten into where almost everybody, including Members of Congress, want you to buy and nobody wants you to sell.

The CHAIRMAN. Do I understand, Mr. Stone, the Grain Stabilization Corporation bought this wheat and it was paid for out of funds advanced by the Farm Board plus the amount of borrowings that you made from the intermediate-credit banks and private institutions?

Mr. STONE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the way the Stabilization Corporation got the money with which to pay for it?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And this appropriation will take care of the whole transaction, based upon the value of the wheat or the price of wheat when it is actually taken from the corporation and turned over to the Red Cross?

Mr. STONE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is a profit, the Farm Board will get it; and if there is a loss, the Farm Board will suffer it?

Mr. STONE. That is right. This is nothing more or less, gentlemen, than a sale of wheat, and the Government is buying it at the market price when it is delivered. We take that money in payment for the wheat and pay our debts with it. If there is any money left, it belongs to the revolving fund. If there is a loss, we have to pay it out of the balance in the revolving fund.

The CHAIRMAN. That is also true of the cotton.

Mr. STONE. That is right.

Mr. ARNOLD. How does this differ from the other transaction involving 40,000,000 bushels of wheat?

Mr. STONE. You did not pay us anything for that. We simply had to credit the revolving fund at the market price of the wheat.

Mr. ARNOLD. And the Farm Board lost all of that.

Mr. STONE. That is right, which I thought was very unfair. We started out, for instance, in the fall of the year thinking that we had $25,000,000 more than we really had, which upset all of our calculations and threw all of our estimates out of line by $25,000,000.

Benefit to Grain and Cotton Stabilization Corporation in making distribution of wheat and cotton

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Stone, the estimate submitted by the Bureau of the Budget, containing, of course, a copy of the resolution which it was desired that Congress should pass, provides that the appropriation should be made out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used only for the purposes specified in the resolution. I take it there could not be any possible objection—and it would certainly make it clearer—if it were simply stated for the purposes specified in subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) of section 3 of such public resolution?

Mr. STONE. I see no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. That covers everything for which an appropriation could be made?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Stone, do you think that Congress is not only warranted in passing this legislation but that it is very important for us to pass it?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. TAYLOR. Can you tell us what you estimate the benefits will be if we pass it, and what the alternative will be if we do not pass the legislation? Will you tell us that for the record?

Mr. STONE. Yes. It simply means that if an appropriation is not made by Congress, we can not live up to the requirements of this resolution.

Mr. WOOD. What benefit will be derived from it other than the benefit that will accrue to the Red Cross by the passage of this legislation?

Mr. STONE. It will reduce the holdings of the Grain Stabilization Corporation and the Cotton Stabilization Corporation down to a point—especially those of the Grain Stabilization Corporation—where they will not be a factor in the market.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is, it will not represent a menace to the price of the product. You think possibly it may tend ultimately to help the price, whereas at the present time this surplus is held over them as a club, as a menace?

Mr. STONE. In other words, it is the black cloud over the market that the grain trade has been talking about for the last two years.

Mr. TAYLOR. Has not that been unduly magnified and without foundation?

Mr. STONE. I can go farther than that. I think it has been maliciously lied about.

Mr. WOOD. That suggests this question: The very fact that it is known throughout the world that the board has a surplus of wheat, does not that have a tendency to lower the export price—that of itself?

Mr. STONE. I do not think it has for this reason.

The price of July wheat three or four weeks ago was identically the same as July wheat was a year ago. That is the only thing I know of in America of which that can be said.

The price of wheat has improved since last October 10 or 15 per cent, and this, too, is the only thing that I know of which that can be said.

Mr. WOOD. How do you account for that similarity?

Mr. STONE. I think the best answer I can give you is the one made to me by one of the large old-line grain operators when I put the same question to him. He started off by painting the old dark-cloud picture, but when I insisted that he answer my question as to why the price of wheat for the last 12 months had ranged from 6 to 18 cents above the world parity price, although we had more wheat in this country than a year ago, he said: "It is due to the way the Grain Stabilization wheat has been handled."

I said, "You tell the public the reverse of that." He said, "There is a big difference between what I have to tell the public and what you have to tell the public. I do not have to tell the public anything if I don't want to; but you have to tell them everything."

The CHAIRMAN. I understood you to say in answer to a question by Mr. TAYLOR that if this appropriation is not made it will be impossible to comply with the law as passed by Congress providing for the turning over of this wheat.

Mr. STONE. That is correct. The only way we have to pay loans on the wheat is to sell it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Do you think if, instead of providing for 45,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 500,000 bales of cotton, we had provided for turning over to the Red Cross all of the cotton and all of the wheat you have on hand, it would be more beneficial?

Mr. STONE. I do not know; I have not thought along those lines.

Mr. TAYLOR. There was some talk on the floor of the House about cleaning up the whole business and putting it all in one bunch, and the reason they did not do that was because it was said that the amount provided for was as much as could be handled or would be needed between now and the time Congress convenes again in December.

Mr. STONE. I think that is probably right.

Mr. TAYLOR. So they said they would wait.

Wheat sold to China and Brazil

Mr. STONE. We have had an opportunity of selling fifteen to eighteen million bushels of wheat to China on credit in addition to what we have already sold there. I do not know whether what we have already sold there will ever be paid for, although I think it will.

When China bought the first 15,000,000 bushels they set aside a certain percentage of their import duties for the purpose of paying these obligations.

Mr. WOOD. Have you any security for that?

Mr. STONE. No. When the trouble broke out in Shanghai there was an interruption, in collections, but since that time they have reestablished at least a part of their import duties and put them into a fund to pay these obligations.

China wanted this additional wheat to use in payment for the construction of roads. They expected to pay their laborers in wheat.

I have had letters from China saying that the wheat that was given away by the relief committee in China had changed a lot of Chinamen from eating rice to eating wheat, and had created a better feeling there toward this country.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is not China one of the apparently few countries that actually tries and intends to pay its honest debts instead of borrowing all it can and then trying to work out some scheme or find some subterfuge for repudiating its obligations?

Mr. STONE. I think it is. I think the obligation will be paid. But whether it is or not, I think it would have been a very good thing to have gotten an additional 15,000,000 bushels of wheat out of this country and reduced our stocks to that extent.

Mr. WOOD. I think if they ever stabilized the Government over there you would have no trouble in being paid.

Mr. TAYLOR. Can you tell whether or not you are dealing with the government that is on top temporarily or that is likely to be on top any length of time?

Mr. STONE. Yes; we dealt with the recognized government at the time, and we have their obligations.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is that same government still recognized now?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

We were criticized very severely last August when we sold 25,000,000 bushels of wheat to Brazil and took coffee in payment for it. Yet Brazil is a country that used very little American wheat. Our exports are largely in flour and have never exceeded 850,000 barrels annually. When the trade for coffee was made you would have thought we had destroyed the milling industry in this country. All of you gentlemen got telegrams about it, which eventually landed in our office.

When I investigated what effect the trade would have on the milling business in this country, I found that 75 per cent of all the flour exported from here to Brazil is milled from Canadian wheat in bond.

You would have thought that this trade was the direct cause of most of the unemployment in this country, but I found that it takes only approximately 200 men to mill 850,000 barrels of flour in a year's time.

That sort of criticism is made, for one reason, and one reason only. It is because the handlers of farm commodities do not want the farmers to organize their own business so they can have something to say as to what they will get for their products.

Difficulties confronting farmers in selling of farm products

I have had experience in farming, and believe that I know what I am talking about. I own some farm land in Kentucky. I have possibly $200,000 invested in land. I do a general farming business. I raise from 30 to 40 acres of tobacco, I have 300 head of sheep, I feed 150 head of hogs, I strip bluegrass seed, and I raise all the grain on the farm necessary to feed the livestock. Under the present marketing system I have not a chance on earth to succeed as a business man in that operation.

We hear a lot about the law of supply and demand. It was set aside, so far as the farmer is concerned, 25 years ago.

To illustrate this point I will explain to you the old system under which I sell all the products produced on this farm of mine. When my tobacco is ready for sale, there are four tobacco manufacturing companies which buy 95 pounds out of every hundred pounds I produce. These four companies are owned by approximately as many stockholders as there are producers of this particular type of tobacco. Through corporate power these stockholders have concentrated their buying power into four men, while the tobacco producers sell individually. In other words, if these four concerns wanted to they could tell me what I would get for my tobacco three years before it is grown, irrespective of what it may be worth based on the law of supply and demand.

In relation to the cattle I handle, the whole operation is done completely in the blind so far as I am concerned. In the fall of the year I invest $10,000 to $15,000 in cattle. I feed a corn crop to them during the winter months, with no idea as to what weights they should be finished at, and in 9 years out of 10 if I finish them at 1,500 pounds the top price will be at 1,200 pounds, and if I finish them at 1,200 pounds in 9 years out of 10 the top price will be at some other weight. I have no information as to the demand for finished beef, no information as to the amount of beef sold the previous year to the public; I have no information as to the amount of beef carried over from the previous year in the cellars of the packers.

The same condition applies in regard to sheep, lambs, and wool. As an example let me analyze for you the method under which I sell my wool. Three hundred sheep will produce around 1,500 pounds of wool. This amount does not justify me to keep in touch with the wool conditions in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, or the Argentine. In fact, I really never know the relation between the price offered by the local dealer and the Boston wool market, which is the recognized wool market of the country. I don't know one wool grade from another, and it wouldn't do me any good if I did as long as I sell as an individual. My local wool buyer tells me the price of wool and if I don't take his price I simply keep my wool, because no one is interested in as small an amount of wool as 1,500 pounds; and yet there is produced in this country, east of Kansas and Nebraska, in small flocks like mine, as much as 100,000,000 pounds of wool annually. Therefore, the price I get under this kind of a sales program is what the local dealer gives me.

Mr. TAYLOR. He tells you a price that somebody else has told him to tell you?

Mr. STONE. Yes; that is the position I am in as a landowner, and there are hundreds of thousands of other farmers in this country in the same fix.

At least three-fifths of the bluegrass seed produced in this country for commercial purposes comes from about 15 counties in central Kentucky. This seed for many years has been bought from the farmers by three or four dealers. These men have made independent fortunes in buying and cleaning and selling this seed to the public, while at the same time the farmer has received hardly enough to warrant him gathering it. My personal experience in bluegrass, for the past five or six years, has been that I have not stripped any for commercial purposes, only stripping a sufficient amount for my own use. The prices paid growers ranged anywhere from 15 to 40 cents a bushel, while the price realized by these men who buy it from the farmer and sell it to the public has ranged during this same period from $2 to $5 a bushel.

Assistance given by Federal Farm Board to cooperative marketing associations

These examples which I have related will give you a pretty fair idea of what the average farmer is up against in the sale of his products under the old system and my interpretation of the real objective of the agricultural marketing act is to assist the farmers of America to develop a marketing system which they will own and control and which through concerted action on their part will give them as great a concentrated selling or bargaining power in the sale of their products as the buyers of farm products now have through their corporate organization, which has been developed over the past 30 years.

That is what we are striving to do, and we are making progress. The only thing I regret is that you Members of Congress do not know what we have done, and we can not get the information to you.

Mr. TAYLOR. Why not?

Mr. STONE. Because you are so busy doing other things that you will not listen to us.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Stone, this deficiencies subcommittee is listening to you now with very great interest, and I know the entire Appropriations Committee of the House and Congress itself would be pleased to have you make as full and complete a statement in this record of all the activities of your board and the matters that you feel that Congress and the country ought to know.

Mr. STONE. I am very glad to have had the opportunity to make this statement to you. I believe if the fair-minded people of this country knew what we are trying to do under this law, that instead of paying any attention to what the representatives of the grain trade, the cotton trade, the livestock trade, and others who are operating under the old system are saying about the act and the board, they would take their coats off and fight for what we are trying to do. I do not believe there is a group anywhere that we can not sell this program to, if we have an opportunity to tell them about it.

I have never worked harder in my life than I have since I have been in Washington. I gave up my business and came here to do this work, but with Congress continuously on the backs of the board, largely due, I think, to lack of information, our difficult job is made just that much harder.

But I am not a quitter; I am going to stay here until the Senate Agricultural Committee investigation is held, and I think when the people of the country know the real facts about what the Farm Board has done and is doing, they will be for it.

We can not get these facts to the public; they are not news. However, if we buy a million bushels of wheat, it comes out in big headlines, and a lot of people immediately get out their pencils and start figuring what the Government is going to lose.

I am not saying things to you I have not said to friends of mine in the grain trade and in the cotton trade. I do not blame them for what they are doing. They are trying to protect their business. But I believe it is much more important for the welfare of our country that the 6,000,000 farm owners succeed in intelligently organizing their business along lines similar to those on which industry has organized, and in that way bring about the desired financial improvement in agriculture.

Mr. TAYLOR. Kindly tell this committee in detail what progress is being made along that line.

Mr. STONE. Real progress, I think. I will be glad to let the chairman of the committee tell you some of the things that have been done in his territory which would not have been done if it had not been for the Farm Board.

The CHAIRMAN. Since Mr. Stone has mentioned it, I want to say this, very briefly:

We had a situation down there that we had up with the Farm Board here. Gentlemen came from all sections of the dark-tobacco districts in Kentucky and Tennessee, and it was very apparent that the farmers were not going to receive anything, practically, for their crop, and chaos was confronting the farmers in my district and in the adjoining districts of Kentucky, in every district where dark tobacco was produced.

Some of the men down there determined or came to the conclusion that the only possible relief was the organization of an association, if you are to call it that, of the producers, for the purpose of having a cooperative association, in order to secure at least a fair price for their tobacco.

They could not do it without money, because it was necessary to advance a certain amount to the producer when he brought his tobacco in. He had to live and pay his debts. There was no place where he could get the money.

They came here and talked with Mr. Stone and the members of his board, and I want to say this for Mr. Stone, that I never in my life—and I have appeared before a great many boards—I have never attended meetings where more sympathetic consideration was given to the farmers. If it had not been for the Farm Board—and I say this without the slightest hesitation—it would have been absolutely impossible for that association to have been organized and to have functioned.

As the result of the creation of that cooperative organization down there the price of tobacco has been from 2 to 3 cents more in the pound than it otherwise would have been. It was just gradually going down, and they had no market.

When that association was formed it created a market, and while they have not been getting anything like what they ought to get, and it was impossible for them to expect it, the organization of that association has enabled those farmers to get a little something as the result of their labor, and I do not know what would have happened if it had not been for the Farm Board.

Mr. TAYLOR. To what extent is that being done in other places? Kindly amplify this matter as fully as you desire.

Mr. STONE. Similar service has been rendered in every State, with the exception of two—Delaware and Maine—and we have done some work in those.

The board and its staff are assisting cooperative marketing associations directly in almost every State. This now includes assistance in teaching farmers how to form and run cooperative marketing associations in 37 States; advice and assistance to existing cooperatives in solving problems pertaining to organization, operating policies, and accounting systems, production and marketing programs, and legal programs, in 109 cases; and assistance in determining whether a cooperative is needed in particular cases, whether one, if formed, would have a good chance of succeeding, and if so, help in organizing one, in 48 cases. There are thus 194 individual projects now under way.

The nation-wide character of the work of the board is indicated by the attached map, which shows the States in which we have helped cooperatives and the commodities we have worked with in each State.

As a practical illustration of what we are doing, take, for instance, the Eastern Shore Potato Association. There is an association that has been in operation for 31 years and has a good financial statement. They handle about 15,000 carloads of potatoes annually. Until these hard times developed in 1929 the association was able to get its financing from commercial banks. Last year about $500,000 was needed. The money was to be used in paying growers, on delivery, for potatoes that had been sold but which had to be graded at the receiving station before shipment to the buyer with a draft attached to the bill of lading. About 10 days elapsed between the time the grower delivered his potatoes and collection from the buyer by the association. The loan thus was needed by the association to finance its operations for this 10-day period.

The association came to the board last year and said. "We can get but $200,000 from the banks, and we have to have $300,000 more or we can not operate our business." The board let them have it, and they paid us back.

This year they were unable to borrow any money from commercial banks and said that if they could not borrow what they needed from the board they could not operate and would be compelled to discontinue their operations.

We loaned them $400,000, and they are handling the potatoes and are paying the money back.

Take the situation in Senator BYRNES's own State of South Carolina. There are two asparagus associations there; one has been operating for 17 years and the other for about half that period.

With nearly every bank in South Carolina closed they could not get any money with which to handle the asparagus crop of their members.

Upon investigation we found that they had some defects in their organization set-up. We sent one of our men down there and helped them straighten out these defects. We then loaned the two cooperatives $55,000, which they needed, and they paid us back in less than 60 days.

There is another interesting thing that is encouraging to me in this work. In the past three years we have had thousands of failures in all lines of business, but among some 12,000 farmers' cooperative marketing associations we have had fewer than 80 failures since 1929. If it had not been for our help, however, I think many of them would have failed.

The Cotton Shippers Association have a lobby in Washington and they have appeared at every meeting where anything relating to the Farm Board or its work has been taken up by any congressional committee. It makes my blood boil when I think that those men are here fighting everything that is being done to help agriculture.

What have they done and what are they doing for the benefit of agriculture? In the last 50 years the wheat men and the cotton men have gotten rich off of the sweat of the brow of the man who raises cotton and wheat. We of the Farm Board are trying to help work out a better system for the men who own and till the land.

And yet these wheat and cotton men come here and sit continuously. There has never been a committee hearing where they have not come in and spilled their talk about what a harmful thing this effort is, and I think it is a crime.

Mr. COLLINS. It is the result largely of combinations, is it not.

Mr. STONE. Yes; I do not think there is any question about it. I have been on the other side of this game most of my life. But I have given up my business and I will not go back into it, because I do not think the old system is a fair one to the farmers.

Take these commodity exchanges. Is there a single member of their boards of directors or governors representing the man who grows the commodity? Is there a man handling farm commodities interested in the price the farmer gets? Every one of these men's chief interest is in getting big volume, because the business is all done on a commission basis of so much per unit of the commodity or on a set-price basis.

We are trying to work out a system, based on the law of supply and demand, where the farmer can, through intelligent organization, have the same trading power as the man who is buying his products, where he can sit down across the table and be able to talk prices based on the law of supply and demand. If farmers can not make money on that basis, they are in the wrong occupation.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is the hope of your board for the future? What are your present objects? All members of both the Senate and House and most of our constituents would like to know and what would you like to have Congress do?

Mr. STONE. The thing I would like to have the Members of Congress do first of all is to know what is in this law. I have found very few Members of Congress who even know what is in it, and they do not know what we are trying to do under it. Many are continually knocking us and our work from daylight to dark. The big trouble is they get their information from the fellow who does not want the farmer to organize his business. I do not think that is a fair way to approach this problem.

Take me, personally. God knows, I did not want a Government job. I am here trying to do something helpful for the fellow who is growing farm products, and I know the Farm Board is doing it in an intelligent way.

Mr. COLLINS. Of course, your principal trouble with Members of Congress is that our Government is so large, and our duties are so numerous, that it is practically impossible for anyone to know all the workings of the various departments of the Government, and the laws that are presented to us for enactment.

Mr. STONE. That is true.

Mr. TAYLOR. There are 18,000 bills in Congress before us right now. No human being could even get a superficial idea of what they all are.

Mr. STONE. I have taken that into consideration, and what I have said has not been in the spirit of criticism.

Mr. TAYLOR. Our Government has become a great big bureaucratic centralized government, the biggest governmental machine the world has ever known. The work of Congress has increased about four times since our chairman, Mr. Byrns, and I came to Congress in March, 1909, in the Sixty-first Congress. The work has increased so enormously that it is utterly impossible for any set of men to do all the work that is heaped upon us.

Appropriations made for expenses of Federal Farm Board

Mr. STONE. Let me discuss briefly the question of the appropriation for our operating expenses.

We have tried to spend the money as if it was our own. Of course, we have made mistakes. We have probably some duplications with other Government departments in our organization.

However, we have gone to the Bureau of Efficiency and had their experts come to the board, to find out where economies could be made.

In three years Congress has appropriated $5,527,000 for administrative expenses of the board. We did not spend the full amount of our appropriation each year just because we had the money, but instead built our organization conservatively and expanded it only when actually needed in order to render the maximum service to farmers and farm organizations, with the result that we have saved for the Treasury in the three years more than 35 per cent of the $5,527,000 appropriated for us. Yet with this record Congress this year cuts our operating funds almost 50 per cent of our current rate of expenditures. Although we are heartily in favor of economy in government, we did object to agriculture being singled out for reductions far greater than those made for any other Government activity.

In this connection, I would like to call your attention to the fact that up to May 31 this year we had made loans from the revolving fund amounting to $985,300,000, with loans outstanding on that date of $469,225,000. This means that the total administrative cost of the board since its creation, $3,527,000, has been only thirty-six one-hundredths of 1 cent for every dollar loaned. The interest collections on loans during this period have amounted to $9,100,000, or more than two and one-half times the total administrative expense of the board.

Our economics department seems to have caused much of the trouble in your minds; we may have some men we can get along without, and would have done so, if necessary, without any action on your part.

We have about 126 different commodities we are loaning money on.

For instance, there is a cooperative association in Colorado, handling beans. It requested a loan. We needed immediate information from our economics staff on beans. It was impossible for us to know what the bean situation was over the world or in the United States, and we had to have intelligent information on beans immediately. Our economics department contacted the economic departments of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, and the Treasury Department, where they have much larger organizations than we have, to get information about beans, bring it back, assimilate it, and put it on our desks in an intelligent form so we can act intelligently on the loan application.

Mr. TAYLOR. Have you been able to do anything for the Pinto Bean Growing Association?

Mr. STONE. The Pinto Bean Association has its troubles. The reason is that there have been tremendous crops of pinto beans, and a bean market that has been declining from year to year for three years. It is a question as to what is the best thing for that association to do. They have been in consultation with us constantly and we are doing what we can to help.

Salaries paid to officers of cooperative associations

Mr. COLLINS. One thing that has been capitalized more than any other for the purpose of prejudicing the public was the question of the salaries of certain officers in the cooperatives.

Mr. STONE. That is true. Personally, I do not think it is wise for a Government agency to try to operate a cooperative. We have loaned the cooperatives money. The only thing we told them was that we wanted efficient, honest men to operate them.

Take Mr. Milnor, for instance. Farmers' National Grain Corporation agreed to pay him $50,000 a year. An examination of the operations of this big cooperative organization shows that the entire executive expense, including Mr. Milnor's salary, had amounted to seventeen one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the business handled. Upon investigation I found that 400 commercial organizations of various kinds paid on the average for similar executive expense 2.77 per cent of the business these concerns handled.

I have tried to look at the salary question in a broad way. Sometimes, when you consider the salary of one individual in a corporation or an association, it looks as if it is out of line, and I am not saying that some of the salaries paid by cooperatives are not too high under present conditions. They have been reduced, however, and will be reduced more if conditions do not improve.

I realize that the enemies of this act, and the enemies of what we are trying to do under it, talk incessantly about the big salaries paid by cooperatives. There are only two men in that class—Mr. Milnor, of the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, and Mr. Creekmore, of the American Cotton Cooperative Association. They are both excellent men. They are technically trained men and are handling a larger business in both grain and cotton than has ever been handled before by any one individual concern.

Mr. WOOD. Somebody said on the floor that a certain man—I do not know whether it was one or the other of these men—was getting forty or fifty thousand dollars a year, and never got over six or seven thousand a year in his life before that.

Mr. STONE. I do not think that is true. Take Mr. Creekmore, for instance, a man who has accumulated a million dollars, so I hear, in his own business, not from salary, but from his own effort and his own judgment; and he was recommended by practically all of the best cotton men in the trade as being young, active, intelligent, and competent. When the cooperatives go to a man like that, who has made a million dollars in his own business, and say, "We want you to give this business of yours up completely and come with us," when neither he nor they know at the time whether it will be successful or not—they can not get men to work on as cheap a basis as they could if they were operating an ordinary business that had proven its ability to succeed.

Mr. TAYLOR. But when he knows, as he must know—you gentlemen all know—the psychology of the thing in our country at these times, it is simply like waving a red flag in the face of a bull to pay anybody $75,000 or $50,000. That one thing has made and is making your board and this committee and Congress itself a world of trouble and severe criticism. We can not justify that to the people back home.

Mr. STONE. You are right.

Mr. TAYLOR. And it seems to me, as a patriotic citizen, and especially if he is a man worth that much money, he should and would promptly reduce his salary. The Members of Congress have made four separate and very large reductions in our salary, clerk hire, mileage, allowance for office stationery, and also increased our own income tax on our salaries. We have cut our salaries 10 per cent and cut our mileage—that is, our travel allowance—25 per cent, and cut our allowance for office clerk hire 8⅓ per cent, and cut our office stationery allowance 28 per cent, and increased our income tax about 300 per cent, making a total reduction of about $2,000 a year for each Congressman.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Creekmore voluntarily reduced his salary 33⅓ per cent, and Mr. Milnor has done something along the same line.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am glad to hear that. They ought to.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Because if they are actuated as they should be and intend to encourage the farming and stock and other business and make a success in a great big patriotic way, they ought to cooperate in every way they possible can.

Mr. STONE. That is true.

Mr. TAYLOR. We get a lot of bitter criticism from home for appropriating large sums of money to your board and then having them consumed in salaries as high as that of the President of the United States. We can not and do not try to explain or satisfy the farmers and local business men and the laboring people generally at all on those complaints.

Mr. STONE. I agree with you.

There is another thing that we have been criticized for. We have been trying to get the story of what we are doing back to the farmers and the business men. It is a problem as to how to do it. I can not get it in the newspapers. They will not publish it, because it is not news—not the kind of news they want. We employed two or three men to appear before business men's service clubs and before groups of farmers all over the country. The minute we did we were accused of having these men out propagandizing the public.

Salary of general counsel of Federal Farm Board

We have also been criticized for paying our general counsel $20,000 a year.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know that. These actions of the board are largely the cause of the effort in Congress to abolish the board entirely and turn over all your activities to the Agricultural Department.

Mr. STONE. I want to explain that. When we came here in 1929 we got Mr. George Farrand, of Los Angeles, who is recognized as one of the leading cooperative attorneys in the United States. He had practically quit practicing law in the cooperative marketing field and was devoting all of his time to the general practice of law, in Los Angeles.

He came here and spent three months with us at a nominal salary to help develop our legal department. It is difficult to realize how broad our operations are. We are doing business in every State in the Union, making loans in every State with the exception of two. We make three kinds of loans—loans on facilities, effective merchandising loans, and loans on commodities. You can imagine that many intricate things develop in doing business in that many States. We had to have a lawyer, so Mr. Farrand told us, who had knowledge and general ability in corporate law, who had practiced in corporate law, and who had experience in cooperative marketing law, and we had one devil of a time finding that kind of a man. We had to have the best legal talent we could get and we struggled along here for three months trying to locate some one who had had that kind of experience. I felt a delicacy in recommending Mr. Reed, because he came from my own State. He was at that time the general counsel in Kentucky for the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Co. He had had six years of experience with the cooperative that I managed for six years.

He had started practicing law at the bottom in the magisterial courts and come on up in his practice to where he was when we employed him, general counsel of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Co. He was making more than $20,000 a year in his general practice. I called him up and asked him if he would be interested in becoming the general counsel of the Farm Board. He said he would. He came here on a basis of $10,000 a year. He has two boys in college.

He discontinued his private practice entirely and is giving all of his time to the board, and after he had been here for 8 or 10 months and had proven to be such a competent man for us, we thought it was nothing more than fair and right to give him enough money to induce him to stay with the board.

His salary has recently been cut by Congress to $10,000 a year, and I do not know whether he can afford to continue with the board or not. The place will be a hard one to fill.

On top of that, other governmental departments are allowed to employ legal counsel at higher rates of compensation with no more responsibility than the legal department of the Farm Board has; and when you realize that we loaned a billion dollars in the last three years, and loaned it at a time when the banks were failing, when agriculture could not get credit anywhere, and have collected back over $550,000,000 of the loans in that time, we have not anything to be ashamed of, and I am not.

Congress has not approached our operation fairly, and the reason for it is that you have not known what we have done or what we are trying to do or accomplish.

Reduction of salary of members of Federal Farm Board

You reduced the salaries of the members of the Farm Board $2,000 a year. I do not care anything about that personally. The only thing I am thinking of, and the most important thing involved in that, is the real importance of keeping the right kind of men on this board; because if you do not keep the right kind of men on it, and if it were ever to get into politics, it would be a menace. I have been on the board for three years, and I have never heard politics mentioned.

We have employed our personnel through merit, those who could do the job and do it intelligently and efficiently.

When I know that that has been our objective; when I know that that has been what we have been doing 14 hours a day, I can look any of you men in the eye and tell you anything you want to know, and go home at night and sleep, and I will guarantee you that as long as I am there I will be able to do just that.

The only thing I regret, gentlemen, is that I do not know all of you personally. What I would like to do would be to sit down and show you just what we are doing. If I could do that, I would have 500 friends in Congress, in my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I am glad that Mr. Stone had an opportunity to talk to us and that we have had an opportunity to hear him.

Mr. TAYLOR. So am I. We have appreciated your statement very much, Mr. Stone. I hope the Members of Congress will read it and that the farmers and producers of the country generally may have an opportunity to read it. We would all like to see your board make a great success. Our country very seriously needs the relief that we Members of Congress all hoped that your board would bring about.

The CHAIRMAN. From personal experience I know something of the work that the Farm Board is accomplishing.

Amount of wheat sold by Federal Farm Board

Have you the figures, Mr. Stone, on how much wheat you have sold?

Mr. STONE. I can give you the approximate figures.

Mr. COLLINS. You can correct them in the record.

Mr. STONE. We had on last July 1 approximately 257,000,000 bushels of wheat.

The CHAIRMAN. You sold 25,000,000 to Brazil?

Mr. STONE. We sold 25,000,000 to Brazil; we sold seven and one-half million bushels to Germany; we sold 15,000,000 bushels to China; we have sold an average of 5,000,000 bushels a month into the general trade; and you have given away 85,000,000 bushels to the Red Cross. That leaves us around 28,000,000 bushels of actual cash wheat and around thirty-odd million bushels of futures.

The CHAIRMAN. What about cotton?

Mr. STONE. The total purchases of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation were approximately 1,300,000 bales of cotton. We still have that number of bales.

The CHAIRMAN. This will take 500,000 of it?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. This is the first sale you have made of cotton?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. We are very much obliged to you. We have been very much interested in your statement.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GRANFIELD] such time as he may desire to use.

Mr. GRANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], introduced House Joint Resolution 463, "To amend the revenue act of 1932 by repealing section 751 imposing a tax on checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money." This resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House. To-day, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] brought to the attention of the Members of this House his reasons for the immediate repeal of the tax on checks and drafts. He was supported this afternoon in his efforts to repeal this provision of the revenue act by our distinguished colleague from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL].

I was not surprised to learn from these gentlemen that the tax imposed on checks and drafts has not only failed to produce the revenue which was anticipated, but it has interfered greatly with business throughout this country. I am constrained at this time to call to the attention of the House remarks made by me when I addressed you on January 28, 1932. At that time the House Committee on Ways and Means had under consideration the revenue bill, and the committee was giving its attention to the recommendations of Ogden L. Mills, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who urged the adoption of a stamp tax on checks and drafts. I am going to take the liberty to quote to you to-day certain statements made by me at that time, which can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday, January 28, 1932, on page 2925. Quoting from the RECORD of that date, I said:

> I do insist however, that a stamp tax or any tax on checks is unwise at this time. It is a method that should not be employed to raise the revenue which is needed. Business is in a very bad financial state, and the imposition of this tax would aggravate conditions and will bring many harmful effects on the paper industry. From my study of this question I am confident that it will produce a reduction of the working forces and add to the increasing army of unemployed. * * * This is no time to interfere with the orderly processes of business in the country. Every Member of this House knows that it is our duty as Members of the Congress to pass legislation which will relieve them, as far as possible, of the financial strain from which they are now forced to undergo by reason of the condition of the times.

I stated then that—

> The imposition of the stamp tax on checks would result in further hoarding of money, and we all know that this practice has interfered greatly with the economic and business life of this Nation. * * * The imposition of this tax would influence many people to use money as a medium of exchange—a method of doing business which is unsound, unwise, and impracticable. Individuals and business concerns would limit their activities in the issuance of checks in order to save the expense incurred if this tax proposal becomes a law.

These remarks of mine in the light of the present situation were most prophetic. The business of our country has been interfered with in an alarming degree in consequence of this tax. Millions of small depositors have withdrawn their funds from our banks, and very little revenue has been obtained by the Government. Our brief experience with this tax has conclusively indicated its ineffectiveness as a means of revenue. Industry and business generally has suffered greatly from this tax.

I join with my colleagues in urging that the Committee on Ways and Means amend the revenue act before the adjournment of this Congress by striking out this provision which is so devastating to the business of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a joint resolution to amend the revenue act of 1932 by repealing section 751 imposing a tax on checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money. This provision of the recent revenue act was one of the Senate amendments. I was opposed to it and voted against it, but it was approved and put into the law.

As has been stated here frequently to-day this tax is not producing the revenue that was anticipated by the Congress when it was enacted. During the World War one of the World War acts required a similar stamp tax.

It encourages hoarding and the keeping of money out of the banks. You are going to find that this will be the result. We have been encouraging the taking of money out of hoarding and getting it into circulation. To require a 2-cent stamp on each check will cause people to pay cash for a great many things, when, if this were not the law, they would put the money in the banks and give a check.

I sincerely hope the Committee on Ways and Means during this session and before adjournment will consider the question of the repeal of section 751 in the interest of encouraging the circulation of money and the prevention of hoarding. I believe this would have a wholesome effect. We are not going to get much revenue from it, and the retention of this section would do more harm than good. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KARCH].

Mr. KARCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including therein an address delivered before the Manufacturers Committee of the Senate last March, describing the halcyon days in Belleville before prohibition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. KARCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted, I insert the following statement of Hon. CHARLES A. KARCH, a Member of Congress, before a Subcommittee on Manufactures, United States Senate, considering Senate bills 436 and 2473, Seventy-second Congress, providing for the legalization of beer as a beverage, January 8 to February 19, 1932:

> The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.
> Mr. KARCH. In my judgment, if beer of the alcoholic content prescribed in this bill would be made a legal beverage, the greater part of the mischief of prohibition would be eliminated. The uncompromising prohibitionist mistakingly assumes that the people of our Nation desire potent liquor as a beverage. This statement is proven by the fact that before prohibition, when distilled spirits were as easily accessible as beer, the price of each within the reach of the poorest individual, 75 per cent of those who used liquor at all confined themselves entirely to beer and wine. Beer was the national drink.
> The city of Belleville, Ill., in my district, has always been known as the wettest community in the United States.
> I may say here that in the Literary Digest poll this community voted 95 per cent for modification and 95 per cent for repeal.
> It consumed the greater portion of the output of two large breweries located within its corporate limits. In addition, a goodly quantity of the Anheuser-Busch product found its way into the retail trade. The whisky drinks were used chiefly by the bonvivants and those given to extravagant habits and luxurious tastes.
> In 90 out of its 100 years of experience it maintained 1 saloon for every 200 inhabitants, three-fourths of such saloons dispensing only beer and wines. Only the hotel bars, as a rule, dispensed distilled liquors.
> I venture the assertion that prior to prohibition, in the entire history of Belleville, the death rate from alcoholic cases was less than one per annum. The police records of that city will verify that arrests for intoxication were negligible. What could be called drunkenness in public was unknown. Life-insurance companies regarded the average Bellevillean an ideal risk, and I dare say there were less rejections for applications for life insurance in that city than in any other city in the United States.
> During that period the general health of these citizens was outstandingly good, and its high percentage of octogenarians and those who lived beyond their allotted span of three score and ten have been beer drinkers all their lives.
> The same community held, throughout that period, one of the highest literacy and intellectual standards. It held the reputation of having the best schools in the Middle West. It held its own with every other community of the North in its number of church-going people. Law observance was 100 per cent. It averaged one murder in 10 years, and those that did occur were either of the manslaughter type or committed by persons who might have justly interposed the defense of mental irresponsibility.
> Prior to prohibition I do not recall a single instance of highway robbery, burglary, or larceny on the part of its citizens. Every man of affairs was an honorable man. The directorate of every bank contained among its number one or more saloon keepers, and all of them were habitual beer drinkers, and not one of them was ever accused or suspected of dishonesty or infidelity to his trust.
> Ninety per cent of the male school-teachers regularly used beer as a beverage. This city produced some of the most illustrious educators of the country, every one of whom freely patronized the beer saloon. Here flourished the noblest of society and the highest of culture and the finest examples of American citizenship.
> What was true of Belleville in those days was also true, in more or less degree, of every city in the Middle West where beer and wine were used as the chief beverages. I would never subscribe to the theory that the use of 4 per cent beer has any deleterious or demoralizing effect upon the American people.
> Thomas Jefferson understood this problem, and the Belleville experience bears out his views in these words imputed to him:
> "I rejoice, as a moralist, at the prospect of a reduction of the duties on wine by our National Legislature. It is an error to view a tax on that liquor as merely a tax on the rich. It is a prohibition of its use to the middling class of our citizens and a condemnation of them to the poison of whisky, which is desolating their houses.

"No nation is drunken where wine is cheap; and none sober where the dearness of wine substitutes ardent spirits as the common beverage. It is, in truth, the only antidote to the bane of whisky. Fix but the duty at the rate of other merchandise and we can drink wine here as cheap as we do grog; and who will not prefer it? Its extended use will carry health and comfort to a much enlarged circle. Everyone in easy circumstances (as the bulk of our citizens are) will prefer it to the poison to which they are now driven by their Government."

If President Hoover was ever right, he was right when, as United States Food Administrator, he contended that the stoppage of beer production during the war would drive the people to drinking whisky, and thereby produce a situation which would militate against the best interests of the Nation. Here are his exact words taken from a letter he then wrote to the Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, United States Senator from Texas, now appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"If we stop brewing, the saloons of the country will still be open, but confined practically to a whisky-and-gin basis. Any true advocate of temperance and national efficiency in these times will shrink from this situation, for the national danger in it is greater than the use of some 4,000,000 bushels of grain monthly in the breweries.

"If the American people want prohibition, it should prohibit by legislation to that end, and not force the Food Administration to the responsibility for an orgy of drunkenness. It is mighty difficult to get drunk on 2¾ per cent beer; it will be easy enough if we force a substitution of distilled drinks for it."

In the same connection, President Wilson urged before the Senate of the United States that the manufacture of beer be not prohibited as a food conservation measure.

Senator BULKLEY. Is that a direct quotation there?

Mr. KARCH. Yes, sir; I have taken that from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 721, put into the RECORD by Senator SHEPPARD.

Senator BULKLEY. What was the date of that, do you know?

Mr. KARCH. June 1, 1918. Is there any question about the authenticity of it?

Senator BULKLEY. I just wanted the record to see how authentic it is.

Mr. KARCH. Thanks.

I may add that during the beer régime in Belleville there was neither gambling nor prostitution. Boys and young men were practically abstemious. I have never known a young girl to drink even beer, and no minor of either sex was ever found in a place where intoxicating liquor was publicly dispensed.

Now what is the picture? I shall not take the time to go into detail, but the conditions which are now known to flagrantly exist with respect to crime and morals and lawlessness everywhere in the United States is also to a considerable extent the situation in that community; probably not so aggravated, and I am, in fact, proud to say that the degrading tendencies of prohibition have been somewhat checkmated there because of the sound morale and the sterling manhood and womanhood of the older generation, which grew up in the age of liberty and still reflects its influence in the social and civic affairs of that community. I do not wish to be understood as injecting the saloon issue into the question of relegalization of beer. However, I do not know of a better method of distribution and dispensation than by means of a local retail store, and call it whatever you may.

Next to the point that there should be enough liberty in the United States to permit any person who chooses to drink a glass of beer, in the scale of importance, is the question of subjecting the traffic in beer to a reasonable burden of the internal revenue of the Nation—not of the Nation alone but of the States and the cities thereof, most of whom are now in a state of insolvency.

The two principal cities in my congressional district before prohibition raised annually as much as $180,000 by way of license. I am certain that if beer becomes a legal commodity, it will be an easy matter for these municipalities to impose a tax or license upon the traffic, yielding a total revenue between $300,000 and $400,000 annually. These amounts will go far to relieve these cities from their present stringency—it will enable them to better police the communities, and at this time relieve the poverty and starvation which exist there as everywhere else in the United States during these times of calamity and national distress.

As stated before, I very much hesitate to inject the distribution question into the present issue. I am confident, however, that the several States and the various municipalities thereof are fully competent to so regulate the traffic in legalized beer as to produce the highest measure of local revenue without reintroducing any of the objectionable features the saloon system may have had in its days.

Now, I venture to say, there are two speakeasies for every licensed saloon these communities had in preprohibition days. That fact presupposes, of course, that a large number of persons are receiving and exacting large sums of money from the patrons of these illicit institutions.

There is really no way of accurately calculating the profit that goes to vendors of illicit liquors, and that is immaterial. The fact remains that many hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent annually by the patrons of these speakeasies, and I am now speaking only of the two principal cities in my district. If we subtract from this vast total expenditure, if such a process were possible, the aggregate sum which would have been expended by these same patrons for the same amount of legally dispensed liquor, then the difference, in my judgment, would equal what is usually called the bootleggers' profit. My guess is as good as anybody else's, and I am sure I am within reasonable bounds when I say that these bootleggers' profits, within the territory I have in mind, are as much as $500,000 annually. It is this bootleggers' profit that I would like to see go back into the public treasuries, and I believe we would be making a fair start in that direction by legalizing beer under this bill, or any other measure undertaking to legalize beer, which Congress would be willing to consider.

Senator BULKLEY. The bootleggers' profit to which you refer is a gross profit, is it not?

Mr. KARCH. You mean is there such a thing as a gross profit?

Mr. HULL. No; hardly. The profit would be just what he would make clear. You could have a gross sale, but you would not have a gross profit.

Senator BULKLEY. Is that after all deductions that he might have to pay for protection, or does he not have to pay anything for protection?

Mr. KARCH. I have tried to show a table here of what the bootlegger takes from the trade. Now, what he does with his income I, of course, do not know, but I assume that a great deal of it is expended for protection.

Senator BULKLEY. Which would be deductible on his income tax, you think?

Mr. KARCH. Well, if the Government of the United States is capable of ascertaining what is deductible—but I understand the Supreme Court here held recently that that was not a proper item of reduction.

In giving this testimony, as you have probably noticed, I am confining myself to matters that have come to my personal knowledge. Many things can be said against prohibition which we all know as a matter of common knowledge, but I prefer, in this brief statement to relate my own observations and experience.

I believe that the legalization of beer would relieve the congestion in the district courts of the United States quite materially, and in the same proportion reduce the present high cost of the administration of justice. In the last typical year before prohibition, namely, 1918, I happened to be United States attorney for the eastern district of Illinois. At that time all of the business of the court was performed by a decrepit and superannuated judge—holding 6 terms within the district annually—by the way, it contains 1,200,000 inhabitants—at an average of 3 weeks per term—18 weeks of court in one year. Now two young judges have all they can do and are busy holding court on the average of 40 weeks each year. The number of grand jurors and petit jurors attending at the court have increased in the same proportion. The personnel in the United States marshal's office and the United States attorney's office has increased threefold. The number of witnesses and the expenses of bringing them to court have increased in the same ratio. What is true of the eastern district of Illinois is true, practically in the same degree, of every district in the United States.

In spite of the fact that we have been increasing the number of judges to expedite Federal criminal business, we hear the Supreme Court of the United States is still concerned about the overcrowded dockets in many jurisdictions and has recommended more judges as the only means of disposing of these overcrowded dockets.

I have a letter from one of the most diligent and capable judges in the United States stating that 90 per cent of the criminal cases in his court represent liquor violations and have clogged his court. I notice to-day the President has nominated an associate judge in his district.

I notice that the President has appointed an associate judge in his district, the southern district of Illinois.

The legalizing of beer, of course, would not remedy the whole evil of overcrowded dockets and the necessity for additional judges and the high cost of the administration of justice. But I contend that if beer were legalized the business and expenses of the Federal judiciary throughout the United States would be decreased at least half, if not more than half.

The people would be more contented and have a greater regard for their Government and would feel more inclined to cooperate with the Government in suppressing the illicit traffic which would remain. Federal enforcement can only succeed with the cooperation of the public, and that, of course, would carry with it the whole-hearted and effective participation by the State, county, city officials, prosecutors, sheriffs, and police in the apprehension and prosecution of alleged offenders against the liquor laws of the States as well as the Nation. It would eliminate the beer racketeer—the largest and most vicious element contributing to the appalling crime situation rampant throughout the country.

The speakeasy could not thrive if the public demand for beer were satisfied by lawful means. The speakeasy is the biggest curse wrought by prohibition. Some of these institutions are orderly and respectable but, nevertheless, nuisances in the eyes of the law and, at best, a menace to orderly society. But most of them are dens and dives, serving both as rendezvous for the gangsters and a lure to the profligate, and in most instances conducted by underworld characters. Here crime is hatched and criminals are harbored.

I can not agree with Mrs. Willebrandt that the speakeasy is as good and as respectable as the old-time saloon. Again I say I do not intend to confuse the issue by injecting the saloon problem; but I often wonder where and how these people who in this day and age condemn the old saloon got their information. The people who rail most against the saloon are people who never saw one. It strikes me that these people get their information from story books written by the Anti-Saloon League. It is all fiction.

It does not become any person to condemn an institution about which he knows absolutely nothing. I do not know what kind of saloons Mrs. Willebrandt saw in her younger days, but the saloon which I knew and had occasion to frequent did not permit any woman to enter, and in those days no woman had any desire to enter a saloon.

Senator BULKLEY. I would like to ask your opinion of the recommendation made by the Wickersham Commission for a substantial increase in the number of prohibition-enforcement officers.

Mr. KARCH. Under the present conditions?

Senator BULKLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KARCH. I would oppose that. I do not see any necessity for it. I do not see any good to be accomplished, because you could increase that force tenfold and the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act in its present form would be unenforced.

Senator BULKLEY. In other words, you think it is hopeless anyway and there is no use to increase the prohibition-enforcement officers?

Mr. KARCH. Exactly, sir.

Senator BULKLEY. Would we not get a greater measure of enforcement if the officers were increased?

Mr. KARCH. You would get a greater measure of enforcement, but you would also have a greater new crop of new violators.

Senator BULKLEY. Why would it produce new violators?

Mr. KARCH. Because there is always somebody ready to start up where somebody else was taken away by the criminal processes.

Senator BULKLEY. Is that based on your personal experience?

Mr. KARCH. Yes, sir.

Senator BULKLEY. And what would be the effect on this congestion in the courts that you refer to?

Mr. KARCH. Well, if we had legal beer, there would not be that particular situation.

Senator BULKLEY. I mean, if the recommendation of the commission were carried out to increase the prohibition-enforcement agents.

Mr. KARCH. Oh, there would be a larger congestion in the courts.

Senator BULKLEY. We would need more judges and more United States attorneys?

Mr. KARCH. You would need more judges, who are appointed for life, and probably beyond the system of prohibition. We would have a lot of idle judges in about 10 years on life tenure. Yes; we would have to have more judges, more marshals, more jails.

Senator BULKLEY. Well, you do not think it would reduce the amount of violations of law?

Mr. KARCH. No, sir. The people of the United States will never submit to the rigid enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, especially if it deprives them of harmless beer to which they have been accustomed and in which they believe, under the spirit of our Constitution, they have a right to indulge.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, an official who does nothing is bad enough, but an official who prevents others from acting is a public enemy. For months Congress has been endeavoring to draw a relief bill and just as they had accomplished a serviceable compromise the White House marplot threatened a veto.

This was not playing politics with human misery, this was cold-blooded, inhuman interference with American rights and procedure for the sake of obeisance to the financial aristocracy of America. The old feudal robber barons suppressed the people by arms; to-day their counterparts do it by control of the public moneys. The medieval big-shots took a chance with their lives, the modern, paramount racketeers let the Republican Party do their fighting. The G. O. P. is like the Hessians, it fights for pay.

The White House accuses Congress of not cooperating. The Democrats went beyond the limits of cooperation when they assented at the White House request to relief for the inane, insolvent, blubbering, staggering Republican Farm Board. Hyde, the teacher's pet of the Cabinet, would help this Republican atrocity of politics in business. Hyde, the reforestation rejoinderer of the White House, is a babe in the woods on the farm question. His administration was so stupid that at last the farmers have realized the injury Republican politics has done them.

When the Democratic conferees agreed to take the Hoover quid on the Farm Board, as a good sport, Hoover should have taken the Democratic quo for all the people. It was a shameless thing for the President to hook his decrepit Farm Board on the mighty Democratic engine for relief.

If Hoover does not sign the relief bill, may the results be upon his head. He has refused to heed the cries of misery from below. He has ever heeded the cry for more from above. His is the real Republican philosophy of letting the pennies of the millions make the millions of the few.

What a fortunate thing for Americans that we face a general election this year; a fortunate thing, particularly, for Democratic Americans. It will produce an orderly revolt by American methods against the domination of malefactors of great wealth and little sense. Election day will see prosperity come around the corner accompanied by Frank Roosevelt and JACK GARNER [applause], and on March 5 we will read this notice in the shipping news of the metropolitan papers:

Among those sailing on the Berengaria for England were Peggy Joyce, Charles A. Levine, Dudley Field Malone, James N. Beck, Clarence True Wilson, and the "forgotten man," who was identified as Herbert Hoover. The ex-President, when asked to comment, said, "I am traveling incognito, because the other passengers might be alarmed that I would sink the ship."

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I want to address the House this afternoon on the subject of the President's message to the Geneva conference on the matter of disarmament; but before we disarm, I want to read a telegram I received this morning from the chamber of commerce of my home city, Portland, Oreg., a great seaport, as you know, on the Pacific coast. This telegram states:

Is there any prospect that the Army supply bill will remain indefinitely in conference? We are naturally worried over the jetty work. The contractors are now proceeding, without assurance of payment, and the work is liable to close down.

This caused me to inquire of the Chief of Engineers about the matter, and he said:

Yes; we owe those contractors $54,000, and that is a situation that exists all over this country. I am about at the end of my resources.

What will be the result if the river and harbor work and the flood-control work have to close for lack of money? It is due to our neglect to obtain final legislative action on the appropriation bills, including the Army appropriation bill, which passed the House on the 9th of June and the Senate on the 19th of June. Why at this late date should we stand idly by permitting the continued deadlock of the conferees on the Army appropriation bill when such inaction results in the suspension of Government work and allows these thousands of employees to be added to the distress and unemployment of the country? You talk about a relief bill; here is a relief bill of first-class proportions held up, and held up by whom?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will tell the gentleman. The gentleman well knows that it is being held up by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. No; it is being held up by Members of this House.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that the man who has been holding up the appropriation bill is the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, who wants to make the Government follow some British major or captain in providing for national defense?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Absolutely, but it is not the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, but the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. COLLINS.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Now that we have got that off our chest, let me proceed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. My good friend has answered his own question, but what is he, a good staunch Democrat, going to do about this terrible situation, which is in the control of another Democrat?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. He is making the situation worse. I do not want to go along with any such proceeding.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I will.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. The gentleman is repudiating him and all his works.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I will yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell the House exactly what is holding up the military appropriation bill? It is a question of officers.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am going to explain that in my remarks—you passed the bill on a false hypothesis. The question now is whether there shall be sufficient money available for river and harbor work.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. No; whether there shall be ten, eleven, or twelve thousand officers. The Senate insists on 12,000 and the House on 10,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The House has no show at all.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Oregon was asked what he is going to do about it.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. What are you going to do about it?

Mr. MICHENER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to paragraph 1½ (a) in Rule XXVIII, a modification that was adopted in 1931, which permits the discharge or the instruction of conferees after the conferees have been appointed for a period of 20 days.

I was going to call attention to the fact that these conferees were appointed on the 18th day of June. Therefore, if I figure correctly, it will be within the power of the House about Monday next to do something. If the gentleman is interested in having something done, I would suggest for his consideration the rule to which I have referred.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Has the gentleman taken into account the legislative days, because there are some Sundays intervening there. The consistent ruling of the Chair has been on every occasion where the matter of days is in question to count only legislative days.

Mr. MICHENER. I think the rule specifically provides for counting calendar days. I read from the rule:

> After House conferees on any bill or resolution in conference between the House and the Senate shall have been appointed for 20 calendar days and shall have failed to make a report, it is hereby declared to be a motion of the highest privilege to move to discharge said House conferees and to appoint new conferees and to instruct said House conferees.

So that regardless of what the organization of the House may desire in reference to this matter, on Monday the burden and responsibility will move to the House, and action can be had.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am glad to hear that, because I think it is about time something was being done.

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman will permit further, to ask the gentleman if the Speaker could not appoint the same conferees and whether we would not get into the same deadlock.

Mr. MICHENER. We can instruct under this rule. The Speaker probably would appoint the same conferees, it is true, but we could have a motion considered to instruct the conferees so that the House would be permitted to express itself regardless of the autocratic attitude of the conferees or of anyone else.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be interrupted further. I want to proceed now to my address and make a few comments on the wonderful pronouncement of the American position with reference to disarmament, made by the President to the disarmament conference at Geneva.

We heard recently on this floor a supposedly great military authority speak at length about the mechanization and implementation of warfare. Mr. Chairman, a doctrine on the conduct of war that visualizes combat on future fields of battle between machines rather than between men is the most damnable doctrine that could be preached, and against the whole tradition and history of this country. All these "old fogy" generals we have had at the head of our Army, who advise our President, are dead set against this extreme mechanization, which is carrying us back to the Dark Ages. As a great free people, the President states our position nobly in this message to Geneva, that we are opposed to this excessive implementation of warfare which started after the close of the World War and has grown apace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. May I have a little more time?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. And I yield three minutes from the time controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who is momentarily absent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, the excessive implementation of warfare is aimed principally at noncombatants and the destruction of private property, the very thing that all real soldiers, men who know about warfare, are trying to avoid.

In the proposals by extremists who prate about replacing men by machines on the battlefield we hear only vagaries as to how this will be accomplished. No one will question the value of motor transport in moving men to the battlefield. That has been done in the past and will be done in the future. But the complete replacement of the foot soldier by the tank, and that seems to be the method of mechanization most talked about, is only a fanciful conjecture. Tanks can be utilized only over certain kinds of terrain, and while there will likely be cases where 2 tanks will be worth 200 foot soldiers, yet there will be many cases where many times that number of tanks will be absolutely worthless. What will be the value of a tank in heavily wooded country or in water-soaked areas? We have just recently noted the absolute failure of tanks in the operations around Shanghai where Japanese tanks were proved to be absolutely ineffective. Tanks contributed nothing in the capture of Kiangwan which was defended by Chinese foot soldiers. The stronghold was captured by Japanese foot soldiers, and the issue was thereby decided. In certain situations, without doubt, the tank can be of valuable aid to the foot soldier, but it does not follow that this machine can replace the foot soldier. Far from it. It merely enables him, in certain situations, to accomplish his purpose, the victory on the battlefield, with greater economy and perhaps more readily.

If mechanization, as visualized, is to obtain the victory by the exclusive use of the airplane, then that, too, is leaning the defense of the United States on a rather slender reed. The airplane is important in war; no military man will minimize its value. However, we must not let popular enthusiasm over aviation cause us to lose the proper perspective. The Army's airplanes are an adjunct to the ground forces and aid the infantryman, together with the artillery and other auxiliary arms, to gain the decision in battle. The very nature of the machine, its handicaps of fragility, its lack of capabilities in coping with adverse weather conditions, its inability to capture any locality, preclude it from replacing the foot soldier in war. I again refer to the recent operations at Shanghai—the story is well known—where the Chinese foot soldiers budged not an inch as a result of the continued efforts of bombardment by the large Japanese air fleet which attempted to bring the Chinese army to submission without the sufferance of extensive casualties by the Japanese. What the Japanese air force did to the civilians in Chapei aroused the civilized world to indignation.

I do not depreciate the value of machines in warfare, and I believe we should provide every suitable machine that will be an aid to the man who fights the battle. However, I take strong issue with a doctrine which, if put into practice, would dupe the American people into a false sense of security by reason of the possession of war-making machines, without adequate provision for man power, trained in the practical and inevitable methods of combat on the field of battle, and with leaders who by years of study and experience are capable of conducting operations with a maximum of economy in blood and money and with the assurance of victory.

Now, mark the difference between the arguments offered as justification for certain provisions of the Army appropriation bill as it was when it first emerged from the Appropriations Committee of this House and the arguments contained in the President's message on disarmament. The President very properly recommends the universal abolition of all tanks, all chemical warfare, and all large mobile guns. He would abolish all bombardment aviation and he would prohibit bombardment from the air. No halfway measures should be accepted, for by such means the intended purposes can be avoided and the effect on the military power of the nations will be disproportionate. If every nation should agree to accept these proposals in their entirety, considerable reduction in the costs of armaments could be effected, for the costs of mechanization are enormous. A bombing plane with a speed of 120 miles an hour to-day costs as much as $70,000. To-morrow that plane may have to be replaced by a newer type capable of a speed of 200 miles an hour. The proposals of the President would, in addition to the savings on expensive implements of war, eliminate to a large degree the dangers to which defenseless civilian populations might be subjected by preventing bombing from the air and by prohibiting the use of poisonous gases. Compare, if you will, these practical proposals with some of the arguments you have listened to on this floor on the substitution of mechanization and gas warfare for man power in war.

On the subject of the strength of personnel of armies, and to which subject I shall confine the remainder of my remarks, the President proposes a reduction by one-third of the strength of all land armies over and above the so-called "police component," using the army of Germany as the yardstick. In other words, he would leave intact in each country an army sufficient to maintain internal order in connection with the ordinary peace forces of the country, based on his suggested yardstick, as well as two-thirds of the "defense component," that additional force maintained for defense against foreign attack. I desire to point out a fact or two in connection with the application of this yardstick to our own Army, which may be a revelation to some who are persistent in their efforts to reduce the strength of our Regular Army. Germany was restricted to 100,000 men in her army by the treaty of Versailles, and this number was determined to insure her internal stability and order and for that purpose alone. Compare this "police component" of Germany with our Regular Army in the continental limits of the United States of only 99,675 officers and enlisted men. We have less than the Germans. Our population is 122,000,000, and Germany's population is 63,000,000. Applying the yardstick on the basis of ratio of population, we find that the United States has no "defense component," and the "police component" only is one-half of what it should be under the formula. We ought to have, on the basis proposed by the President, a Regular Army in continental United States of approximately 200,000 men. Mind you, that does not allow the United States any "defense component" of regular forces.

In addition, under his plan, we should have additional forces in our overseas possessions. If we should apply the yardstick with wealth per capita as the basis, the strength of our Regular Army in the continental limits should be 250,000. If the yardstick should be applied on the basis of relative areas, a factor which can not be overlooked in the exercise of police power, our Army should be sixteen times the size of the German Army. The President understands those things. He has able advisers around him, and he has the good sense to take their advice, because it is based upon knowledge of the Army and upon knowledge of military history. By the application of any logical factor, therefore, the Regular Army of the United States should be increased to give it a police power the Allies acceded to Germany; yet in the Army appropriation bill as passed by this House, we reduced the Regular Army by 2,000 of its trained leaders.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the action of this House in voting to reduce the Regular Army by 2,000 officers was a grave mistake, which I hope will be rectified when the conferees determine to give us another vote on this matter. The action of the House, if it were in accord with the sound proposals for disarmament of the President of the United States, should have been to increase the Regular Army to a minimum figure that will assure "adequate national defense," rather than cutting down the existing inadequate forces on which we must rely to hold off an enemy until our great citizen forces can be assembled and trained to meet the foe. What were the arguments that were used to defend the action of the House in reducing the Regular Army by 2,000 trained officers, besides the specious, absurd plea for mechanization on which I have already addressed some remarks?

Economy and promotion. These bear analysis.

It has been stated that the economy to be effected by retiring the 2,000 officers would be $3,800,000 in the fiscal year 1933. No mention was made of the fact that over $900,000 would have to be spent to send these officers to their homes and to make the essential redistribution of the remaining officers to carry on at such of the vacated positions that would have to be continued. It was asserted that a large saving would be made in the housing program of the Army if we had 2,000 less officers. The truth is that the approved housing program of the Army, if the required sum is ever appropriated, will bring the officers' quarters up to a total of 8,388. Whether the Army has 12,000 or 10,000 officers, the housing requirements will remain unchanged, for the 2,000 officers would be removed largely from duties not at Army posts where housing facilities are supplied. Officers not on duty at Army posts are given commutation for quarters, the saving for which is already included in the estimated economy of $3,800,000 to which I have referred. One other inaccuracy on savings to be effected needs to be examined. The expense of travel and promotion through longevity for 2,000 officers was expressed as being "about $20,000,000 annually." That estimate is grossly in error, for if we take one-sixth of the total of travel expenses and longevity pay of the Army bill as it passed the Senate, or $9,801,517, that saving could be only $1,633,586. So we see that this House was grossly misinformed on the economy that would result by an action which would cut a most damaging and irretrievable swath through the heart of our national-defense system. The argument was presented that these 2,000 officers on the retired list would be just as available to step into the ranks in case of emergency as if they remained on active duty and that their services would not be lost to the national defense. That is absurd.

Not only would these officers become less available for active duty as time went on but their capabilities to render maximum service would fall off most rapidly; certainly their value to the Nation as retired officers would in no wise be proportionate to the difference of one-fourth of their pay that would be saved. There would be small saving, but truly it would not be an economy. The more apt term to describe this procedure is extravagance.

Much has been said about the great service that would be rendered the Army in the matter of promotion by effecting the elimination. This is nothing but a herring dragged across the trail. Promotion in the Army can not possibly be facilitated by reducing the number of officers in each grade, and some of those who offered the argument to the contrary ought to have had a clearer understanding of the problem. They not only quoted from the report of the Interdepartmental Pay and Promotion Board, which made findings and recommendations in the interests of procuring a reasonable plan for adequate promotion in the commissioned ranks, but read interpretations into that report that were far afield. Mr. Chairman, I consider that these misinterpretations, presented to prove that a reduction of officer strength would create a healthy situation for morale in the Army, were most unjustifiable. The facts are that this board at no time suggested the reduction of the officer personnel by 2,000 or by any other number. Its findings were based upon the desirability of increasing the flow of promotion with the object of eventually eliminating the "hump" caused by increasing the size of the Army at the end of the World War. It recommended the desirability of permitting a certain number of officers to retire each year, their places to be filled at once from those below.

Wherein does the plan to take out 2,000 officers, some from each grade, and not thereby create vacancies to be filled from those below, make for promotion or the elimination of the hump? It can not possibly solve the perplexing problem in any sense, and I deplore the loose talk that has taken place on this floor about the creation of a normal flow of promotion and the enhancement thereby of the efficiency and contentment of the Army. I contend that even were a contribution made toward the solution of the promotion problem, that could not be a justification for reducing the officer strength and thereby further weakening our national defense.

The matter of ratio of officers to enlisted men has been seized upon as an argument for the reduction of the number of officers. Erroneous figures have been quoted purporting to show what an undue proportion of officers we have in our Army. I have previously given you, as have others, the correct figures on foreign armies. There have also been shown here the requirements for the body of officers we have to-day; in fact, it has been forcefully pointed out that for our defense establishment as it now exists we have 2,000 less officers than are actually required. Inasmuch as our whole national-defense system must have a staff, many instructors, supervisors, and planners, if it is to be kept in order, no relationship exists between the number of Regular officers necessary for these manifold and important duties and those who are merely necessary to officer the units of our small Regular Army. In this continuing body of officers reside the professional knowledge and technical skill which insure that the enormous latent military strength of America shall be used to the best advantage. To reduce that strength would be the height of folly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, when statements of fact are made which are probably inaccurate, I think the House is always desirous of having such inaccuracies corrected. The gentleman from Oregon has brought a rather severe charge against a Member of the House, who I find is absent this afternoon, since it was understood there would be no business transacted. It seems that all the blame which he considers to be blame is, in his opinion, chargeable to one Member, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. I am reliably informed that the differences between the House and Senate conferees at this time are that the House conferees have proposed to yield to the Senate by accepting a reduction of 1,000 officers from the number authorized by the House to be retired and to limit such reduced strength of the Army officer personnel to one year. The House conferees are the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]; the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WRIGHT]; the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PARKS]; the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], who was former chairman of this same subcommittee; and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CLAGUE], who for some time has also been a member of this subcommittee. My information is that the Senate conferees have not indicated a willingness to accept any proposal of the House conferees looking to a reduction of the present officer personnel of the Army.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman has been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs for a number of years, and he has served honorably and well. The gentleman knows that to take a military man out of active life for one year, with a view to putting him back the following year, would be exceedingly bad practice, does he not?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama one additional minute.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits of any proposal made by the House conferees, but in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN], I felt that the House would at this time like written into the RECORD the facts relating to the matter in disagreement between the conferees as to the officer personnel. The House conferees, who are distinguished Members of this body, will, I assume, at the proper time explain their proposal.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I hope they will. Does the gentleman recognize that of the majority conferees on this bill only one Member is present in Washington at this time?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I have no knowledge as to that.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. That is my understanding; that only one of them is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I have obtained this brief time for the purpose of reading a dispatch which the International News Service is sending out and which will appear in the evening papers to-day. The International News Service is reliable always, and therefore I am sure they have the facts with regard to this matter. The dispatch is from Lausanne and I read it now:

> Agreement on a new reparations treaty scrapping the Young plan and providing for liquidation of Germany's postwar obligations in a lump sum totaling $750,000,000 was reached by France, Germany, and Great Britain here to-day.
> Representatives of Italy, Belgium, and Japan accepted the agreement late this afternoon.
> A plenary session was set for 9 p. m. The treaty will be signed to-morrow.

This news, which I have every reason to believe is reliable, comes with crushing effect upon this country. A year ago last June when President Hoover, in the absence of Congress, agreed to a moratorium for one year, I received one of his telegrams asking me to agree to it, and I replied refusing to do it. It is in line with the policies of this administration. Yesterday a bill was vetoed in advance. A year ago an indebtedness of over $10,000,000,000 to us from foreign nations was canceled by the President for one year. At that time I stated in my interviews that this meant we could expect no more payments on the amount due us from foreign nations. When he granted that in this unconstitutional way and when he polled Congress and made good on it last December, he canceled $10,000,000,000 which they owe us. When he did that he in effect accomplished this—this means nothing to those countries over there. They lose nothing by it. Those were political debts, but we borrowed $10,000,000,000 from our nationals, which we loaned to them, and we still owe it. Our taxpayers will be compelled to pay that through future years.

Now, it has already been admitted that the bill we have passed fails to balance the Budget by at least $150,000,000, and I think the amount is more than that. You must remember that in balancing this Budget we counted as cash $269,000,000 the allied nations will owe us this year.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois an additional five minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Therefore this means, under the facts as they exist now and without any further losses from our income sources, that to-day and this hour the deficit for the fiscal year upon which we have now entered is $419,000,000, almost half as much as it was for the year 1931, and this in spite of the fact that we have been compelled to inflict upon the people of the United States over $1,000,000,000 of new and irritating taxes.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. I do not understand from the dispatch the gentleman read, as I heard him read it, that the United States was a party to the agreement or that it made any reference to the indebtedness which the foreign countries owe the United States.

Mr. RAINEY. The United States is not a party to this agreement.

Under the Hoover administration we have pursued a splendid policy of isolation. Under the Hoover administration we kept away from all these entangling alliances, as they are called. Under the Hoover administration we had no voice whatever in this settlement which places upon us this enormous burden and which means that our taxpayers will now be compelled to pay this enormous amount.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. My recollection is that the President very definitely stated that he was opposed to the cancellation of foreign debts or any further extension of the payment of interest.

Mr. RAINEY. It does not make any difference what he says. Of course he is not going to be in favor of it now, with the campaign approaching.

The reporters who cover the State Department, I am reliably advised, will send out dispatches to-day saying that the State Department is now ready to enter into negotiations for the purpose of scaling down still further the amounts which are owing to us, and we have already canceled 50 per cent of them.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. In view of the fact these billions of dollars were loaned to the foreign governments by the Democratic administration, when the Democrats get in power will they be able to collect 100 cents on the dollar?

Mr. RAINEY. The mistake was made in ever putting the gentleman's party in power. That is where the mistake was made. [Applause.]

From the moment in 1920 that the gentleman's party took charge—and those were prosperous times—from that moment these depressions commenced until now we are staggering under the depression which will affect us from now on more than any other nation in this world.

From that moment they commenced to form across the seas the United States of Europe, and to-day we are left on the outside of their tariff walls simply looking in. To-day their markets are closed to us, and our ships are rusting in our harbors, and our income from every possible source has been diminished.

I understand also, although it does not appear in this dispatch, they agreed over there to-day that they would pay us no more money on this indebtedness until prosperity returned to them. This is the situation now, and this is what our splendid policy of isolation under three Republican administrations has done for us, and this is where it has left us.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. I was interested in a statement made by the gentleman relative to the State Department taking up negotiations. I recall that the House placed a rider on the Franco-American agreement last December which forbade any further negotiations looking toward a reduction or cancellation of the debt.

Can the gentleman tell us how the State Department can proceed now with that rider on the bill?

Mr. RAINEY. I can not tell the gentleman. But a President who can violate the Constitution twice will find some way of getting away from a proposition like that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois an additional five minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman has mentioned that there will be a deficit of some $450,000,000 in the Treasury in the present fiscal year.

Mr. RAINEY. I said according to the figures available to-day it would be $419,000,000.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is right.

Mr. RAINEY. There is no doubt but what it will be more than that.

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not doubt that a bit. I am wondering, in view of this statement, what action the gentleman, as leader of the majority party in the House, is going to take before we adjourn to safeguard this particular deficit and provide against it.

Mr. RAINEY. That is up to the initiative of the leader of the gentleman's party. It is up to him to say whether he wants to keep Congress in session here long enough to meet this tremendous impending deficit.

What kind of taxes does he want to levy to do it with?

Does he want to make the tax on first-class mail matter 5 cents instead of 3 cents?

Does he want to increase the tax on checks?

Oh, we are face to face with some unpleasant things as a result of the administration of the gentleman's party in the last four years.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. In reference to taxes, the gentleman suggested that there might be something done. Does the gentleman think, if we were to bring in a sales tax, which the gentleman favored when it was before the House previously and which would balance the Budget, that he could induce enough Members on his side to join with us to pass a tax of this kind, which is sound, according to the gentleman's own contention, and which will balance the Budget?

Mr. RAINEY. Remedial measures to meet this depression must be basic in their character, and there is not the slightest chance as long as Mr. Hoover is President of the United States of accomplishing the slightest thing in the matter of bringing about a betterment of conditions, and there is no use to try to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois five additional minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman's party in Chicago the other day adopted a plank in their platform which is basic in its character for the immediate modification of the Volstead law for the raising of revenue.

Is the gentleman going to do anything about this during the present session?

Mr. RAINEY. Do not make a speech in my five minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am not; I am asking a question.

Mr. RAINEY. At this point in my speech—I have not got it right here—I will insert extracts from the campaign speeches of Mr. Hoover four years ago in which he declares himself unequivocally and forever against any repeal of the eighteenth amendment or any modification of the prohibition laws in which he declares himself drier than any man in this House.

THE PRESIDENT'S POSITION FOUR YEARS AGO ON PROHIBITION

I have the extracts here and in this connection, and at this point, it becomes necessary for me to quote the President of the United States, and I quote for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] in order to indicate to him and to others who so strenuously uphold wet banners on the Republican side of this House, where the President stands.

On the 11th day of August, 1928, when Mr. Hoover was notified by the Republican National Committee of that year of his nomination, his address of acceptance was delivered in Stanford Stadium in California. Bands played, drum corps marched, airplanes flashed overhead. The speech of acceptance was carefully prepared, and among other things he said:

I recently stated my position upon the eighteenth amendment, which I again repeat: "I do not favor the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. I stand for the efficient enforcement of the laws enacted thereunder. Whoever is chosen President has under his oath the solemn duty to pursue this course."

On September 17, 1928, in the State armory in Newark, N. J., in his address Mr. Hoover referred to prohibition as having "contributed to magnificent progress."

Again, on October 6, 1928, at Elizabethton, Tenn., the President said:

Abolition of the liquor traffic has become a part of our fundamental law—and later on in the same address he said:

The purpose of the eighteenth amendment is to protect the American home.

In his Madison Square Garden speech on the 22d day of October, 1928, in New York City, Mr. Hoover condemned any proposition to change "from prohibition to the State purchase and sale of liquor."

These utterances of the President show where he stands. They are unequivocal. The Republican platform may be construed by the wets as being wet, and it is so construed by Senator BORAH and by other leading drys belonging to his party, and they refuse to support it for that reason. The platform is so evasive that some drys find that they can stand on it; but the utterances of the President in the campaign of four years ago are not evasive. They are perfectly clear. I am unwilling to believe that for reasons of expediency the President is prepared now to abandon his convictions.

Yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] voted against the bill which contains the propositions for relief which his city of Chicago is demanding. He voted against it because the President was against it.

The gentleman from Illinois nails the beer flag to his masthead and courageously stands for it, and he will stand for it until he finds the President is against it, and then his convictions on the subject of prohibition will disappear like a morning mist in the rising sun. The gentleman from Illinois is a Republican first of all. He follows Republican leaders. He is ready to surrender any conviction if the President of the United States apparently is opposed to it. The gentleman from Illinois is an ideal Republican.

Sincerity, even on the question of liquor, would demand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] support in the approaching election the Democratic candidates for the Presidency, running on an unequivocal Democratic platform. If, unfortunately for the country, Mr. Hoover should be reelected, and if he should maintain his dry stand as his dry followers expect him to do, we will find the gentleman from Illinois tearing down his beer flag which he has nailed to his masthead and will find him following in dry paths of his leader.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman, of course, is not answering my question about the basic principle for collecting revenue adopted at Chicago, and on which modification plank the gentleman will run for reelection.

Mr. RAINEY. I am a candidate for reelection. The President will veto any beer revenue bill, even if such a bill could be passed now. He, in effect, also vetoed this proposition in advance in the speeches he made four years ago. I want to say, in the brief time I have, that I admire the gentleman's courage. He is the bravest man in this House. He admitted on the floor yesterday that he had voted against this war, and he did. Then, when we are engaged again in a war more serious than that, an economic war against poverty, unemployment, and the present Republican depression, which demands a remedy at once, and when we presented this remedy to him he voted against it yesterday. He has voted now against two wars, and, of course, it takes a lot of courage to vote against two wars.

Mr. BRITTEN. Not when both wars are wrong in principle.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman nails his banner to the masthead and stands for beer. Beer is in his judgment the remedy for every situation that affects this country.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is right.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman has been finding his way into the public prints in Chicago, advocating loans for Chicago in order to feed her unemployed, advertising that he is making a most tremendous, a magnificent, and winning fight here to get money for Chicago out of the Federal Treasury, in order to do what Chicago can not do for herself, and yesterday provisions were in the bill by which Chicago can borrow up to $45,000,000 for the purpose of feeding her 600,000 unemployed, which she is feeding every day.

Yesterday in the bill there were also two provisions under which municipalities can borrow for self-liquidating projects and for any project that will employ labor. That was all in the bill, and it was in the bill largely in the interest of his city. I put them there myself. The gentleman had nothing to do with it. The gentleman who has been so courageous and so brave in the newspapers in trying to get money out of the Treasury for Chicago yesterday was so courageous and so brave that in order not to offend the President of the United States he voted against his own city and against her chance to get anything out of the Treasury of the United States to meet conditions which have been brought about in one of the great cities in the world, the second city in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. May I ask the gentleman if he, like myself and others from Chicago, received a telegram to-day from his Democratic friend, Mr. Bowler, of the sanitary district?

Mr. RAINEY. I received it.

Mr. BRITTEN. That telegram stated, if you please, that the bill passed yesterday in no sense took care of the situation in Chicago.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Bowler has been listening to you and you did not know what was in that bill. The telegram stated that the sanitary district could not borrow.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is mistaken. He is of the gentleman's party.

Mr. RAINEY. But he seems to have been misled by your vote. The sanitary district also was taken care of in that bill. If they have a proposition which employs labor—and they have—they can borrow money under this bill. You voted against it, and Mr. Bowler got his information from you, not from me. I corrected him by telling him the facts, and he will find out to-morrow, if he does not know it now, that you voted against the bill. All the people of Chicago will know that to-morrow. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes. If the distinguished majority leader had read anything other than the despatch with reference to the conclusion of successful negotiations that had been going on for several days past at Lausanne to try to bring Germany and France to an accord on reparation payments, he would have known that throughout those negotiations it was stated as a fundamental that the United States would not relieve the foreign governments from the payment of international debts. But from his position of authority he jumps to the conclusion, absolutely unwarranted by the facts, that it is the policy of the present administration to cancel foreign debts when it has been the policy of the present administration throughout that those debts would not be canceled.

I had hoped that instead of the plaint and whine of the distinguished majority leader against this accord he would have hailed it as one of the great achievements in international relations. But, no. He takes occasion to minimize the accord, whereby France has yielded from the total payment of 34,000,000,000 marks as the amount that Germany should pay to the small amount of 3,000,000,000 marks, or an equivalent of $750,000,000.

I stated earlier in the day that it was a matter of congratulation that those two great powers, Germany and France, had got together so that those countries, and, in fact, all of Europe could revive industrially. I also stated that it was my primal belief and had been my primal belief for years that this country could not revive industrially until conditions abroad had revived. I am hopeful and expectant that with this accord, which I acclaim as one of the greatest master achievements of Ramsay MacDonald, Premier of Great Britain, we will now see conditions in Europe revive and conditions in America revive.

The gentleman says that the moratorium which President Hoover negotiated a year ago, when Germany was on the brink of financial disaster and bankruptcy, meant a cancellation of debts owing to us to the extent of $269,000,000. If he had known the very A B C's of that negotiation he would have known that was merely a deference of the payment of that amount, to be spread over a period of time, and not a cancellation. If the distinguished majority leader had known more about international relations and was not concentrating so much on political maneuverings, he would have known that France is obligated on December 1 next to pay $30,000,000 of her war debt and there is no question it will be paid. If he had known a little more he would have known that the $10,000,000,000 of international indebtedness represented by bonds would have to be paid or the foreign governments would be in default. Now, these foreign governments are not shysters who are going to default on their bonded obligations, and until some negotiations have been consummated changing the present foreign indebtedness, it is expected they will pay the full amount of the bonds.

Of course, there are only a few more days of this session of Congress and we will have to expect the majority leader on every occasion possible to emit fulminations of political speeches, not based on facts but only on the vagaries of his mind. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COYLE].

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Chairman, two years ago I made a report to the people of the district in which I stated that every Member of Congress had a duty to keep his constituents informed as to his own work and his views on the issues which came before the Congress. I still regard that practice as an excellent one. The session now drawing to a close has perhaps been the most momentous since the war days. We have all been faced with trying and difficult problems to solve. My own sincere desire has been to follow unswervingly the course which my judgment dictated as best for the people of the country as a whole and for the people of my district. On some questions, it is true, that judgment has run contrary to the desires of the heart as regards certain groups of people. Nevertheless, I have considered it my duty to the electorate of the district to follow the course which such judgment as I have indicated was for the greatest common good. The pledge of the Spartan soldiers more than 2,400 years ago, when they were defending the Pass of Thermopylæ against a force of Persians many times as great, might very well at this time be transposed to serve as a pledge for every American:

"I pledge service to my fellow man.

"I pledge whole-hearted cooperation in solving America's problems in the best interests of all her people.

"I pledge that I will transmit the freedom and democracy of my America unmarred and even greater than it was transmitted to me."

MORATORIUM ON FOREIGN DEBTS

The President's action in 1931, while Congress was in recess, in recommending that an extension of time be granted our foreign debtors was without doubt a wise and timely one. I was glad to support that proposal when the Congress met last December. I do, however, oppose cancellation of the foreign debts. The United States has been just and generous to our allies. If the allies fail to pay completely their debts to us, the taxpayers, who are the people of the United States, will find it necessary to raise by taxes whatever shortage there is in that payment by the other nations. It really means that the taxpayers of the United States must pay as the Liberty bonds which raised the money that was advanced fall due. I am, as heretofore, convinced that at least the principal of these debts should be paid by the foreign nations.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

I supported the President's proposal for setting up the machinery of the Federal Reconstruction Finance Corporation, with $500,000,000 of original capital and authority to expand its resources to $2,000,000,000 by the issue of bonds, "to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry"; $200,000,000 was allocated for the relief of banks and their depositors. The Finance Corporation met and helped a real emergency in our banking situation. While bank failures have been distressing, there is no question but that the situation would have been a great deal worse if such an organization had not been created shortly after the convening of Congress to give assistance to those banks who were in an entirely solvent position but were not able to liquidate on short notice on loans which in normal times would be regarded as eminently satisfactory and safe security.

REVENUE ACT OF 1932

The increasing of taxes is always one of the most unpleasant and difficult tasks facing a legislator; but one of the most urgent problems facing Congress when it convened last December was the balancing of the Federal Budget. The tax problem was linked with the urgent necessity for curbing and economizing in governmental expenditures. It was early estimated as necessary that a revenue measure should be enacted which would return to the Treasury an additional $1,000,000,000 of taxation annually. I favored the idea of the general sales tax as a temporary measure for two years. I believe that it would raise needed money in a fair and rather painless way and would be effective in balancing the Budget. The adoption of the general sales tax would have made unnecessary the nuisance taxes and discriminatory taxes levied on certain lines of business, increasing postage rates, and so forth. It was not quite possible, however, to accomplish inclusion of the sales tax in the revenue bill in the House because of rather concerted opposition from many Members from the South. Practically all legislation is a compromise, and I voted for the tax bill as it was finally enacted in the opinion that it was a measure necessary toward stabilizing the finances of the Government and in the hope that the balancing of the Federal Budget would provide an incentive for better business conditions. I also favored the measure because it included an—

EXCISE TAX OF 10 CENTS PER HUNDRED POUNDS ON IMPORTED COAL

The growing importations of anthracite from Russia, and more recently from Indo-China, were rapidly assuming such proportions as to constitute a real menace to the Pennsylvania anthracite industry. Along the northern Atlantic seaboard, during the year 1931, there was imported, free of all duty, nearly three-quarters of a million tons of anthracite. The importation figures for 1932 were exceeding those of 1931, and during the month of February, 1932, there was imported in that one month alone more than 140,000 tons of coal.

For each 6,000 tons of this coal for household use which comes into the United States there is lost to the American miner and American railroad man the pay for the mining and preparation and labor of transporting 10,000 tons, this because of the fact that 40 per cent of the American production is in small sizes and can only be mined when there is a market for the household sizes. Much of this foreign coal was sold by the importer to dealers in the Atlantic ports at from $2.50 to $2.70 per ton less than the going market rate. The cost of ocean transportation on cargoes from Indo-China in American dollars has been about one-half the established freight rate on coal from my district in Pennsylvania to these same New England and Middle Atlantic ports.

Early in the consideration of the revenue bill, as the chairman of the anthracite group in Congress, I served notice, in an address in the House, that at the proper time an amendment would be offered providing for an excise tax on coal.

For purposes of strategy, due to the Democratic complexion of the House, it was deemed advisable to have a Democratic Member from the anthracite region offer the amendment. Its adoption was made possible, however, by the fine cooperation of all Members from the anthracite field in Pennsylvania. I do take some pride in the fact that my office served as headquarters and clearing house for the movement to get this import tax enacted. I have been more interested in getting results than in claiming credit.

This tariff on imported coal, as now carried in the 1932 revenue law, will be advantageous in putting some American miners back to work. We have, and can produce, in this country ample anthracite equal to any hard coal in the world. Also, this tariff will be a revenue producer for the Federal Government, and furthermore it will not result in increased cost of fuel nor in any other respect cost one dollar to any American consumer. The only loss will be the loss of certain—as yet unearned—profits of a few importers on the Atlantic seaboard and a certain loss of potential markets for Russian and Chinese miners.

ECONOMY IN GOVERNMENT

An economy program, making curtailments in the appropriations and usual expenditures of the various Government departments, was enacted into law. The program includes furloughs of Government employees and other reductions and is estimated to produce $150,000,000 of savings in the expenditures of the Government in order to help meet the Treasury deficit.

PROHIBITION

Several efforts were made during the session to get action on the modification of the Volstead law or resubmission of the eighteenth amendment. Although I voted for or was paired for such action in these attempts, they were all unsuccessful. It has been apparent for some time that conditions in the United States were not the conditions anticipated by proponents of the eighteenth amendment and which they desired and hoped for when the amendment was adopted. The matter is one that should be again submitted to the people of the United States for their decision. Men may change but principles remain. It is clearly the right of the people to pass on this question at the present time, since there is no doubt but that millions of citizens desire that the amendment be resubmitted.

WORLD WAR VETERANS AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

Whatever the condition of the country, I frankly acknowledge the debt which the Government owes to our dead soldiers, to the wounded, to bereaved families and to all for whom the absence of their men meant distress, and to the soldiers whose career was damaged by their service in arms. For that reason I supported the bill to grant pensions to widows and orphans of World War veterans, which passed the House but which has not yet passed the Senate. The very fact that there is depression in the land makes the hardships confronting widows and orphans much more severe than they would otherwise be and emphasizes the need for this legislation.

The cash payment of the bonus, however, was a point where my judgment rather went contrariwise to the desires of the heart. I do have a continuing and lifelong interest in the welfare of all men who have served their country in war time. The hundreds of former soldiers whose names are in the files in my offices at Washington and Bethlehem will bear testimony to the time and energy I have gladly spent to get cases satisfactorily adjusted before the Veterans' Bureau and the Pension Bureau. However, the only practicable way to pay the bonus in cash would have been to saddle additional burdens on the taxpayers, in which the veterans, of course, would participate. Borrowing the money was out of the question in these times. I could perhaps think of nothing that would retard economic recovery more than the issuance of $2,400,000,000 in fiat or pretend money. To the statement that the payment of the bonus would expand the currency, the very reasonable reply seems that if such be the case there is far better reason to pay the cost of government by the issuance of greenbacks than by the levying of taxes. When we get down to the facts—which, as often happens with facts, is disagreeable—the United States can only pay by borrowing or levying taxes. At this time especially, with what I feel to be the interest of all citizens at heart, I could not support cash payment of the bonus, which is not due for 13 years, and my vote was recorded against the measure in the House.

EMERGENCY-RELIEF PLAN

A bill providing a total of $2,120,000,000 to meet the present emergency conditions is being considered, which I favor and am supporting. I think it will be passed; $300,000,000 will be available for direct relief to the destitute; $1,500,000,000 will be available for loans to put into effect self-liquidating projects in an effort to provide much-needed employment on necessary improvements; and a public-works program, calling for an expenditure of $322,000,000, will be inaugurated.

PERSONAL SERVICES

My office has been open and functioning at all times, in order to give prompt and careful attention to all requests received from constituents. These requests cover a great variety of matters—pensions and compensation, patents, insurance, passports, immigration, military and naval enlistments and discharges, publications, post-office matters, and so forth. Hundreds of applications have been handled for Federal fish and every possible cooperation extended to improve fishing conditions in the district. I am always glad to hear from the people at home in the district and am more than pleased when it turns out that I can render some service to them.

ELECTION CONTEST

In an undoubted legal and proper way the people of the district nominated and elected me to the House of Representatives in November, 1930. However, my opponent, who had twice been in Congress, but who was fairly and honestly defeated, filed a notice of contest, claiming that "frauds, irregularities, and substantial errors occurred in each and every election district." At the time it was rather generally known that there was not a scintilla of truth to support the slanderous allegations made. Several months after the election a bold attempt was made to steal the congressional seat by changing marks on ballots in six precincts in Carbon County, but overwhelming evidence was presented during the weeks that the case was in the court of common pleas, Carbon County, clearly showing that fraud was perpetrated after the ballot boxes had left the custody and control of the election officers, and that fair and honest returns had been rendered by the election officers. The matter was carried to the House of Representatives at Washington; and after examining all the evidence and holding a hearing, the Committee on Elections No. 1, comprised of six Democrats and three Republicans, submitted a unanimous report to the effect that my opponent had not sustained in any way any of the charges made by him and recommending that a resolution be adopted declaring me duly elected. Unanimous action was also taken in the House in passing that resolution; and although the Democratic Party has a majority in the House, and, of course, controls the proceedings, not one voice was raised in support of my opponent nor was one vote cast for him. It is self-evident that my opponent realized he had no basis on which to pursue a contest; it is also self-evident that he relied upon partisan politics only to vote him the seat in Congress to which he was not elected. I would feel very remiss indeed did I not express sincere thanks to the members of Elections Committee No. 1 and to the entire membership of the House for the courteous, fair, and judicial manner in which this contest was at all times handled.

GENERAL

In spite of many obstacles the Federal Government has done everything that is possible for it to do to cure the present evils. There are some signs—faint, but still discernible—that the brighter day is dawning. If out of the hard times there comes in industry a shorter work week and a longer time for the individual to broaden education and powers of enjoyment, and a larger share of earnings to faithful workers, then will the trials and sorrows of the times have been not in vain.

CONCLUSION

There have been many other things of moment and of interest that I have been forced to omit, lest I weary my listener or reader. I have continued to attend closely the sessions of Congress and to attend to my duties on the Naval Affairs Committee, believing that by so doing I could best serve my constituency and increase my standing in the House. As a consequence, it has been necessary that I be in Washington much of the time, as Congress has been in session almost continuously for the past seven months. In matters of legislation I have made no pledges except the one to myself to be guided by the interest of the people of the district and to vote and work for the interest and fair name of America. For the confidence that the people have reposed in me I am very grateful, and in return I promise always the best service that it is in me to give.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, some newspaper writers and others who have not taken the time to investigate and ascertain the facts have, in recent years and especially during the present session of Congress, had much to say about the alleged abuses of the franking privilege by Members of Congress. Most of these statements are rash, grossly inaccurate, and unfounded.

To illustrate the reckless and ridiculous limit to which this palpably false propaganda is being carried, I quote from a recent issue of a reputable Missouri newspaper, which said:

> An eminent authority tells us that the Members of Congress franked 789,000,000 pieces of mail last year, which cost $11,500,000 to transport, from which it is estimated that the paper used, the printing, and franking of mail cost the taxpayers of our country on an average of $48,000 for each Congressman.

Of course, if any "eminent authority" made any such statement, he deliberately prevaricated. I am sure the editor who published this absurd statement was entirely too credulous and unwittingly gave publicity to obviously false and asinine propaganda.

The total cost of printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in 1931, including all labor and material, was only $570,658, which is less than 4 per cent of the total printing bill of the Government, and is less than one-fifth of the cost of the printing for the Department of Commerce, and less than one-half of the Patent Office printing. I quote from the report of the Public Printer who says:

> The charges to the Government for congressional printing does not include the cost of printing copies of speeches which Members of Congress send to their constituents. This expense is borne by the Members themselves.

Members must pay for printing the speeches they distribute. The Public Printer fixes the price, and Members must pay that price. I am informed by the Government Printing Office that the charge includes the cost of all labor and material, and a part of the overhead expense of the Government printing plant. The Public Printer charges a price sufficient to reimburse the Government for all the labor and material used in these reprints, and practically as much as a commercial printer charges for the same service.

Irresponsible parties have gone so far as to charge that the post-office deficit for several years is due to the use of the frank by Members of Congress. The statement is absurd, as can be readily demonstrated.

The operating deficit in postal revenues for the fiscal year 1930 was $98,448,782 and $146,545,199 for the fiscal year 1931. By the direction of Congress the Post Office Department has for several years made a very thorough investigation to ascertain the cost of carrying each class of mail, and the last cost-ascertainment report was submitted by Hon. F. A. Tilton, Third Assistant Postmaster General, on December 7, 1931. The collection of statistics and the allocation of revenues and expenses to the different classes of mail and services proceeded according to well-established statistical methods and mathematical formulas.

The report explodes and conclusively disproves the claim that the free carriage of certain classes of mail is even in a remote degree responsible for the inability of the Post Office Department to balance its budget in recent years. This century-old bugaboo about the franking system bobs up every few years and is seized with avidity and worked overtime by the uninformed who either thoughtlessly or designedly overvalue its importance, overlooking the fact that the franking privilege is only used and can only be used in connection with official or departmental business and does not extend to the personal, business, or political correspondence of Members of Congress.

Habitually the cost of the franking privilege is grossly exaggerated. To borrow a phrase coined by Mr. Tilton, Third Assistant Postmaster General, in addressing the National Association of Postmasters at Detroit September 10, 1931—

> You all have heard this criticism and have seen cartoons and caricatures depicting the mailman struggling along the road under the load of congressional speeches, cook stoves, furniture, and other articles.

According to the findings of the cost-ascertainment committee—Table A, page 10—it cost the Government in 1931 only $530,298 to carry all the franked mail of the 531 Members of the House and Senate, which, of course, included only letters written on official or departmental business and public documents of every kind and character, including copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The total cost of handling and carrying all congressional franked mail in 1931 was slightly more than one-third of 1 per cent of the $146,000,000 Post Office deficit, or less than thirteen one-thousandths of 1 per cent of the total Government expenditures for all purposes in 1931. Moreover, if all the franked mail carried for the 531 Senators and Representatives had been charged for at full postage rates, it would have produced only $723,671 revenue, or less than seventeen one-thousandths of 1 per cent of the total Government expenses for 1931. I am quoting official statistics embodied in an official document and further certified, not only by the Third Assistant Postmaster General but by Hon. Walter F. Brown, Postmaster General, and his executive assistant, Harold N. Graves.

We must not overlook the fact that the mail franked by Members of Congress constitutes an exceedingly small fraction of the "free mail," or mail carried without payment of postage, and a distinction must be made between congressional or "franked" mail and departmental official or penalty mail. Postage-free mail is divided into four classes:

(a) Letters on official business and public documents carried for Members of Congress.

(b) Letters and public documents carried for certain Government institutions and persons not Members of Congress, that is, official mail matter of the Smithsonian Institute, Pan American Union, National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and the mail of widows of our Presidents.

(c) Newspapers and other second-class publications carried free in the county where they are published.

(d) Mail for the blind.

Now remember all postage-free mail is not franked mail, and all franked mail is not mail carried for Members of Congress.

The computed cost of carrying the postage-free mail mentioned above is as follows:

Franked mail of Senators and Members of the House	$530,298.50
Franked mail other than for Members of Congress	98,680.03
Mail carried free in county, newspapers, etc	8,425,242.11
Mail for the blind	106,932.85
Penalty mail for the Post Office and other departments and branches of Government	8,643,300.46
Total postage-free mail	17,804,453.95

It will be observed that the total cost of carrying congressional franked mail was less than 3 per cent of the total cost of carrying all postage-free mail. So, instead of the congressional frank being largely responsible for the $146,545,199 postal deficit for the year 1931, we find that the total cost to the Government of carrying the franked or official mail of Members of Congress is only one two-hundred-and-seventy-sixth part of the deficit and less than 3 per cent of the total expense of the Government for carrying all kinds and classes of postage-free mail, and as I have shown only thirteen one-thousandths of 1 per cent of the total Government expenses in 1931. Or to state the matter in a different form, only $1 in every $276 of the postal deficit is chargeable to the congressional frank, and only $3 in every $100 expense of the Government in carrying postage-free mail is chargeable to the congressional frank, and only $1 in every $8,000 of Government expense goes for carrying congressional franked mail.

There is a widespread belief that Members of Congress use their frank to avoid the payment of postage on personal business or political correspondence. Such is not the case. A Congressman or Senator can only legally use his frank on letters written by him on official or departmental business and for the transmission of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or official documents issued by the United States Government, and Members of Congress must pay regular postage on all their letters relating to their personal business or political affairs.

If a person writes a Member of Congress about any matter not relating to the Government or some of its activities, the reply of the Member must be stamped. But if the Member is writing about official business, or any Government matter in relation to legislation, pensions, veterans' affairs, compensation claims, hospitalization, postal or rural route affairs, or in relation to anything connected with the Government or any of its activities, his letter is carried postage free under his frank, because it relates to Government business.

The franking privilege permits the free carriage of a Member's letters in which he discusses pending legislation or any official business in which any citizen is interested; but if the Member should add a paragraph relating to his personal or political affairs, he must and does pay postage on the letter. If a Member sends any political pamphlets, books, or circulars through the mail, he must pay regular postage thereon.

Now, there is a difference between franked mail and penalty mail. Penalty mail is mail matter carried for the departments and branches of the Government relating to official business. According to the cost-ascertainment report, the handling of this penalty or departmental mail in 1931, cost the Government $8,643,300. Please bear in mind that this is not for handling mail for Members of Congress but represents the estimated cost of handling the mail of the departments, boards, bureaus, and commissions of the Government. Of course, there is no reason why the Government should pay postage on its own mail, nor is there any sound reason why the Government should require Members of Congress to pay postage on their letters relating to official or Government business or for the transmission of Government publications.

All newspapers and other second-class publications are exempted from paying postage on their papers or periodicals circulated in the county where they are in whole or in part published; and, according to the cost-ascertainment report, it cost the Government in 1931 $8,425,242 to handle these free-in-the-county publications. This discrimination is granted on the theory that these local papers and other publications have an educational and cultural influence, promote the civic betterment, and improve community life.

I do not oppose this policy when applied to the county newspapers because I realize that they make a very valuable contribution to our social and civic life, but while newspapers and periodicals, that go free in the county where they are published, are being handled by the Government at a loss of $8,425,242 annually, it does not become them to complain of the $530,298 that it cost the Government to handle the franked mail of the Members of Congress, all of which relate to departmental or other Government business. In other words, the newspapers and periodicals whose issues are handled free in the county of their publication are enjoying a Government subsidy amounting to $8,425,242 annually as compared with $530,298, the total cost of carrying the official mail of 531 Members of Congress and the public documents they distribute.

In 1931 first-class mail produced a revenue of approximately $47,000,000 over and above what it cost the Government to handle it. But second-class mail, consisting of newspapers and periodicals, was carried in 1931 at a cost of $96,674,617 in excess of the revenue collected by the Government for this service.

Now the following are some of the items largely responsible for the ever-increasing postal deficit:

It cost the Government $23,388,894 more to carry third-class mail than the Post Office Department collects for that service. It cost the Government $20,031,599 more to handle the parcel post than the Post Office Department collects for that service.

It cost the Government $26,626,067 more to handle our foreign mail than the Post Office Department collects for that service. Of this loss on foreign mail, $5,784,435 is on account of our foreign air mail service, and the remainder, $20,841,631, on account of foreign mail other than air mail.

The special services in connection with registration, insurance, C. O. D., special delivery, money orders, and postal savings cost the Government $30,353,680 more than the Post Office Department charges for such special services.

Excess cost of airplane service over the postage revenues derived from air mail is $17,167,501.

So it is quite evident that the expense of carrying congressional franked mail is not a drop in the bucket as compared with the losses on many other classes of mail.

It is a well-known fact that metropolitan newspapers habitually misrepresent or fail to report the proceedings of Congress, and color their news reports in accordance with their political and economic views. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD furnishes the only source of complete and accurate information as to the proceedings in Congress, and while the franking privilege is frequently abused, on the whole it serves a useful purpose because it gives the people access to the only source of information from which the actual transactions of Congress may be obtained. It would be fatal not to publish the proceedings of Congress. The American people do not want their Representatives to work in the dark.

Each Member of the House is entitled to only 60 copies of the daily issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which supplies only a fraction of the demand. If a Member wants additional copies he must buy at the same price charged the public. And if a Member wants to circulate reprints of his speeches he must pay a price fixed by law which is sufficiently large to cover the cost of all the labor and material used in such reprints.

I have seen numerous articles in newspapers and periodicals referring to the alleged abuses of the congressional frank, and as these criticisms are based on a misunderstanding or misrepresentation of the facts, and inasmuch as the complaints and inuendos are unfounded, I have thought it worth while to present the facts as disclosed by the official records, to the end that this baseless criticism and misrepresentation may end. The people should be told the truth, for it is the truth that makes men free, tempers their opinions, sobers their passions and enables them to wisely judge and charitably weigh the actions, motives, and impulses of their fellowmen.

I will go as far as anyone in condemning the abuse of the franking privilege, but newspapers should be fair in appraising men and measures and should not withhold or misrepresent the facts on which their conclusions and criticisms are based.

A newspaper may intentionally or unintentionally create a false impression in several ways:

First. By misstating facts.

Second. By withholding facts or failing to state details the knowledge of which is necessary to enable the reader to form a just judgment and opinion.

Third. By misconstruing or drawing unwarranted conclusions from the admitted facts.

In view of the well-merited power and influence of the public press I am sure that the conscientious editor will appreciate the wisdom of not abusing that power, as is frequently done.

The reader in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred does not have access to the sources of information that are available to the news writer and editor, and consequently there is very naturally a disposition on the part of the public to accept the news items and editorial utterances as accurately reflecting conditions, and in like manner news reports from which important facts are omitted are given to and accepted by the public as embodying the essential facts in reference to any particular matter, and as public opinion is based largely on what people read in the newspapers, a grave responsibility rests on editor and publisher not to abuse their influence or misrepresent those whose actions they assume to describe and appraise.

Undeniably the newspapers as a class have either intentionally or unintentionally misrepresented the extent of the use and abuse of the franking system, thereby creating in the minds of their readers an opinion based on a misstatement of facts, and which is grossly unfair and unjust to Members of Congress.

Now, it costs the Government $530,298 to carry all of the official correspondence and public documents to which I have referred. The 531 Members of the House and Senate write every year probably as many as 5,000,000 letters relating to official, departmental, or public business, all of which are in reply to communications from constituents; and each year the Members of the House and Senate, in response to requests from their constituents, procure and mail several million farmers' bulletins, agricultural yearbooks, reports of the departments, bureaus, and commissions, statistical reports in relation to agriculture, industry, and business—in fact, public documents containing much valuable information and which are printed and distributed in response to a widespread public demand. Now, no one will contend that Members of Congress should pay the postage on these millions of documents and letters relating to the official business which their constituents have with some of the departments or agencies of the Government.

The franking privilege is as old as our postal system. It serves a useful purpose and is bottomed on a sound public policy. A Member of Congress is the agent, representative, attorney in fact, or, if you please, the "hired man" of the people of the district he represents. He is practically the only agency through which his constituents contact the Government and carry on their transactions with the Government. A system has grown up, and which will probably continue, under which the Member of Congress is expected to handle all the business of his constituents with the departments, bureaus, boards, and commissions.

If a constituent is interested in the establishment, changing, or extension of a rural route; if veterans or their dependents have claims for pensions, disability allowance, disability compensation, adjusted compensation, war-risk insurance, or hospitalization; if there is a vacancy in the position of rural carriers or if a consolidation or discontinuance of a rural route is contemplated; if teachers desire employment in the teaching service in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, or in the Indian Service; if ambitious young men desire appointments to West Point and Annapolis or in the National Park or Forest Services; if young boys from the farm who have completed their high school and vocational training want employment in the Bureau of Animal Industry or in some other governmental activities; if postmasters, city carriers, rural carriers become involved in any controversy with the departments; if young men and young women back in the district who are graduates of business colleges desire employment in the classified service; if a constituent is in disagreement with the Government as to the amount of his income tax; if the amount of an estate tax is in dispute; if a Government employee has been removed from the service; if a constituent wants a farm bulletin, Agriculture Yearbook, a soil-survey map, or other Government publications; in all these and in a multitude of other cases the constituent writes his or her Congressman, who is expected to, and does, render the desired service promptly and cheerfully.

There is so much Government in business and business in government that every year hundreds and thousands of a Member's constituents have business transactions of some character with the Federal Government, in the disposition of which he utilizes the services of his Congressman. You and I did not establish this practice. It existed long before we came to Congress, and these services demand each year more and more of a Member's time. We are glad to render this service, because it is frequently all that a constituent gets out of the Government. A Member of Congress who would refuse to perform these services for his constituents would and should be retired to private life.

Now, the service to which I have referred not only requires many visits to the departments, bureaus, and commissions, but in the course of a year necessitates the writing of many thousands of letters, the transmission of many thousands of legal documents relating to these Government matters, and the transmission through the mail of hundreds and thousands of pamphlets and Government documents. Obviously there is no reason why a Member of Congress should be required to pay postage on mail matter of the character to which I have referred, and which relates to the business of his constituents with the Government, and to a service that he is cheerfully performing without charge, as every service of this character by a Member of Congress must be gratis.

The franking privilege does not put a penny in the pocket of a Member of Congress. He has no interest in these transactions except to serve his constituents, and certainly he should not be compelled to pay postage on letters that relate solely to the business his constituents have with the Federal Government and in which the Congressman has no personal interest and in the transaction of which he is rendering a free service.

There is another service a Congressman renders that should not be overlooked, and which, without the franking privilege, could not be efficiently and satisfactorily rendered. I refer to his correspondence with his constituents in reference to legislation. Years ago very few persons wrote to their Congressman about pending legislation, but it is different now.

At every session thousands of men and women back in the home districts write their Congressmen urging them to support or to oppose this or that legislation. They ask for copies of bills that have been introduced relating to legislation in which they are interested and which they think will be harmful or helpful to them. They ask for the printed hearings—that is the testimony of witnesses given before the committees having jurisdiction of the particular bill. They want the printed majority and minority reports which analyze the provisions of the bill and give the arguments for or against the measure.

Farmers write about farm relief or other legislation which they or their organizations believe will promote the welfare or militate against the interests of the agricultural classes. Bankers, farmers, and others write about legislation relating to banking and currency, operation of the Federal Reserve Board, expansion or contraction of the currency, liberalization of credits, guaranteeing bank deposits, increase in commodity prices, branch banks, and other kindred subjects. Farmers, shippers, railroad groups, and others write in reference to legislation directly or indirectly affecting railroads, passenger and freight rates, interstate bus and truck traffic, the surcharge, and Government ownership or Government regulation.

Employees and employers write about labor legislation, settlement of disputes, prevention of strikes, old-age pensions, and the wage scale. Wets and dries unbosom themselves to their Congressmen, demanding this and protesting against that legislation. Government employees back home bombard their Congressman protesting against salary reductions, and not only hundreds but thousands of constituents take their pen in hand and write Mr. Congressman demanding a reduction in Government salaries and other expenses. One group writes demanding a 5-day week and a 6-hour day, and the same mails carry as many protests opposing legislation based on this principle.

Farm organizations use the mail in advocacy of this or that formula and in opposition to this or that legislative proposal. The average person has no accurate conception of the extent to which the constituents of a Member of Congress communicate with him in reference to pending or proposed legislation and demanding the repeal or amendment of previously enacted laws.

In short, in this day and age the constituents of a Member of Congress proceed upon the theory (and it is a correct theory) that the Member is their representative, agent, and hired man, and that they have a right to communicate with him, advise him as to their views, and expect him to reflect their wishes in matters of legislation.

It is a hopeful sign when a constituency takes an active interest in all legislation and keeps in close touch with their Representative. Do not think for one moment that our constituents are not interested in legislation. Do not imagine they are not following the proceedings in Congress. They are able to analyze pending bills. They know whether this or that bill will help or hurt them. They know what legislation will promote the welfare of their respective vocational groups. I welcome this correspondence.

I want to hear from my constituents. I delight to answer their inquiries and to render the service they very properly demand at my hands. This is a Government of, by, and for the people, and the people have a right to keep in touch with their Senators and Representatives and to assert their right to have their interests considered and safeguarded by legislation.

A Congressman who is unwilling or fails to perform this service should and will be quickly sentenced to private life. The Member conducts all this correspondence and renders this service without money and without price, as it is his duty to do, but if he had to pay postage on all these many, many thousand letters, public documents, and Government publications which the constituents demand, and to which they are entitled, it would mean a tremendous expense, and there is no rule or reason why a Member of Congress should pay postage on mail matter of this character, all of which relates to official business.

Organized business and the special-privilege groups are able to keep their agents and attorneys in Washington to present their cause and to protect their interests, and the common people of the Nation would be absolutely helpless if they could not command the services of their Representatives and Senators. Without the franking system the value of this service would be negligible.

I am convinced that very few Members of Congress abuse the franking privilege. In my office (and I am sure the same practice prevails in every other Member's office) the rule is that every letter that goes out must be stamped unless it clearly and unmistakably refers to official business. My office force understands that if there is any question as to whether or not a letter is frankable we resolve the doubt in favor of the Government and send it out under full prepaid postage.

I am sure the average editor or publisher has no desire to misrepresent the facts in relation to the franking privilege or to criticize Members for wrongdoing when they have violated no law or rule of ethics or good taste. I have, at the risk of being tedious, made a detailed statement of the extent to which the congressional frank is used, in order to correct a widespread misunderstanding, and in the hope that editors and publishers may hereafter state the facts more accurately and be more just and charitable in their appraisal of the actions and motives of public officials, who, under the most discouraging and difficult conditions, are endeavoring to serve their country and fellow men and at all times do the right thing.

In this connection I will say that the Congress of the United States is the most economical branch of our Government. The record conclusively demonstrates that every activity connected with the Congress costs the Government less than the same character of service costs in the executive departments. For instance, Uncle Sam's total printing bill in 1931 was $14,546,440, of which $2,499,995 was for congressional printing of every kind and character, and the sum of $12,046,445 was for printing in departments over which the President's Cabinet members preside.

The printing bill of the Department of Commerce was more than the entire printing bill of Congress. The printing for the Patent Office cost nearly one-half the total cost of all congressional printing. The following table shows the printing expenses of the several executive departments:

State Department	$250,559
Treasury Department	941,489
War Department	684,459
Navy Department	747,348
Interior Department	249,138
Post Office Department	1,895,680
Department of Justice	341,234
Department of Agriculture	1,080,021
Department of Commerce	2,894,677
Department of Labor	239,644

In addition to the foregoing, the printing for a multitude of boards, bureaus, commissions, and other governmental activities cost several million dollars. In fact, 83 per cent of all of the printing expense of the United States Government relates to departments, bureaus, boards, and commissions in the executive branch over which President Hoover presides. While critics find plenty of time to misrepresent the cost of the congressional frank and the cost of printing and distributing congressional speeches, they are silent in reference to the $12,000,000 spent for printing by the departments, boards, bureaus, and commissions which are under the direction and personal supervision of the President.

Under the appropriations made by the present Congress the Government printing bill for the ensuing year will be $4,000,000 less than last year's expense for printing, which is another evidence that Congress is the most economical branch of our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ].

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply interested in the unemployment problem confronting the country to-day. It has been with us now in an aggravated form for over two years. Every Member of this House, every thinking man and woman in this country considers unemployment our major problem.

I look with the kindliest interest on any proposal which will tend to lessen unemployment. There has been much discussion of the statement made in his acceptance speech by Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Democratic nominee for President of the United States, relative to his plan for placing 1,000,000 men at work by a National Government reforestation program. God knows we all wish for the consummation of a plan which will carry with it the relief, through employment, of such a large number of distressed, footsore and weary, jobless American citizens. Just how will Governor Roosevelt's plan work out when the bare facts are considered, when the most authentic facts regarding reforestation are considered, with full weight given to each factor and knowledge gained from past experience, is studied?

In the first place, what are marginal and submarginal lands? According to testimony given before the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee of the House and numerous articles written on the subject of placing waste lands to greater use, marginal land can not be tilled with profit; submarginal land can not be tilled without a loss; neither types of land justify the tillage. All who try to till these lands will remain in the slums of agriculture. It is a social and economic crime for families to remain on the land.

That there are millions of acres of such land has been established by witnesses from various parts of the United States, but particularly from the Southland. Such marginal and submarginal lands may or may not be cut-over lands and they may or may not be susceptible to reforestation, although it has been indicated that the major portion of the marginal and submarginal lands of the Mississippi Valley from Canada to the Gulf are for the most part susceptible to reforestation. There is no doubt that the tillage or cultivation of marginal and submarginal lands has a great influence on the surplus of agricultural crops, and the sad part of it is that for the most part these crops are produced at a loss.

I have given considerable study to the utilization of marginal and submarginal lands, and believe it one of the most important of our national problems. Sooner or later this problem will be undertaken by the Federal Government, but it is far from so simple a problem that it can be solved in the manner suggested by Governor Roosevelt.

The major portion of these lands, if we exclude semiarid lands, I should say all of the lands, with the exception of the 11 Western States, are privately owned lands. Neither marginal nor submarginal land is found in great isolated tracts, easily classified and purchasable in large lots, but, as a matter of fact, is scattered and in many instances is adjacent to first-class farm lands. For this reason the initial move to be made in the plan for their purchase is a classification of the marginal and submarginal lands, their appraisement by men who must actually go on the ground, and the presentation of lists of tracts to be acquired, together with the appraisal value by a board established for the purpose. Contacts must then be made with the owners, prices agreed upon, titles examined, abstracts drawn, and deeds transferred.

The next question that would have to be settled is whether the county and the State would be willing to take vast acreages off the tax roll, because with the transfer of title to the Federal Government or to a corporation representing the county, State, and Federal Government the land would be taken off the tax roll, and in some cases half the wealth of a county would be stricken from the tax rolls, resulting in the loss of the major portion of the revenue collected by the county.

It has been suggested that bonds be issued, self-liquidating bonds, that would ultimately be paid off by the harvesting of the timber crop. Would the county or State be willing that the revenue should go to the Federal Government when throughout the years they had lost taxes by the transfer of the land to the Federal Government? I think not. Then, if arrangements were made so that after 25 or 50 years, when a crop of timber had been grown and time came for the harvesting, what portion of the harvest of the timber crop should go to the State, and what portion should go to the Federal Government? Surely the State is entitled to a portion of same in lieu of taxation. In any event, regardless of the proportion of the timber harvest going to the State, legislation would have to be passed by the State providing for participation by the State in this Government-State forestry operation.

These are the questions that must be answered in any plan of reforestation of marginal and submarginal lands—questions that can not be answered on the moment, and I dare say that in every State where they were brought up they would become a political issue.

If any Member of the House disagrees with me on these points I would be very happy indeed to have him explain his position and clear my mind of the doubts that I have as to the immediate benefits of any utilization plan for marginal and submarginal lands suggested by the Democratic nominee for President or anyone else.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] takes issue with the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Hyde, and according to the Washington Post of July 7, from which I quote, says:

> Farmer Hyde has an apparent idea that reforestation consists of going to a nursery, buying a seedling, and planting it. He overlooks entirely the great problems of flood control and soil erosion, which are gripping the attention of the people to-day. He does not understand the immense amount of work connected with the preparation of the soil, the problems of drainage, and especially the matter of reforestation of cut-over land, which means the thinning out of thick underbrush, the preservation of the useful trees, and the elimination of the useless varieties.

Will the gentleman from Texas please explain to me whether he intends to have the employees of the Government, for that is what they would be in any such reforestation plan as proposed, go on all these lands which are privately owned to thin out the underbrush or does he intend to take up this work without asking the owner, without any classification of the land, without appraising it or having the title examined, in fact, without taking any of these preparatory steps which are essential unless we set up a dictatorship or have the Federal Government take over the police power of the various States? I am not referring at this point to Government land but rather to land to be acquired hereafter.

I agree with Mr. Ovid Butler, executive secretary of the American Forestry Association, when he says:

> To give the impression that forestry offers only the possibility of tree planting is in the judgment of the American Forestry Association to dismiss the subject without fair consideration of the very large and diverse possibilities which the field offers.

At least a year would elapse before actual work could commence on any appreciable scale through the utilization of lands outside the present program of the Forest Service. Later I will show that even then the plan presented for the utilization of marginal and submarginal lands could not be developed to the place where any large number of men could be employed without direct appropriation by Congress for work that is not self-liquidating in character.

Let us discuss now the plans of the Forest Service on lands either acquired or to be acquired by the Federal Government.

In 21 States situated east of the plains the United States Forest Service, pursuant to the Weeks Act, have acquired 4,675,000 acres of land for the purpose of carrying out a national plan of reforestation. This land was purchased for $21,070,000 at an average cost of $4.51 per acre.

To round out these acquisitions by the Government the Forest Service will purchase, under a 10-year program, 7,779,000 additional acres, for which there has been authorized by Congress the sum of $31,500,000. It takes time to acquire title. Certain procedures must be followed, as I have indicated. It is estimated that the purchase of these 7,779,000 acres could be completed in from three to five years.

All of the States in which this land already acquired or to be purchased is located have passed legislation providing for cooperation with the Federal Government. In a number of States the acreage of land that the Government may acquire is limited; others accepted the provisions of the Weeks law with certain exceptions noted.

When a crop of timber is harvested, whenever that may be, the Congress has guaranteed to each of the several States 25 per cent of the profit and 10 per cent to go toward the construction of roads and trails within the reforested areas. It is estimated that of the total national forests, including the 4,675,000 acres acquired under the Weeks law, that there are 2,000,000 acres which need replanting.

With an appropriation of $250,000 for 1932, there was reforested about 25,000 to 30,000 acres.

This acreage could not be expanded materially for at least two years. The various tree seeds must be gathered, planted in tree nurseries, and allowed to grow two or three years.

The propagation of trees does not lend itself to sudden expansion. The tree suited to the site must be used, although there are certain species adaptable to a wide field.

A number of States are following a policy of reforestation—some of them replanting as much as the Forest Service.

The work of replanting is split between spring and fall—about six weeks each or three months in all, during which time the trees are actually growing in the ground.

A small force of men is employed during the growing season, 150 to 200 days per year, in the nurseries.

Depending upon conditions, from 600 to 1,200 trees per acre are planted. One man may plant from 400 to 2,500 trees per day.

On an average, a man plants an acre per day, and the time taken in planting an acre varies from 3 hours to 20 hours. This work of planting would be supplemented by camp and nursery labor.

Since the amount of land in national forests presents but 2,000,000 acres needing replanting, the program of land purchase and acquisition is slow, and the propagation of nursery stock can not be suddenly expanded, it is clear that no large number of men can find employment in the work of reforestation.

Such work, as I have indicated above, is self-liquidating in character. It will return its cost in time through the harvesting of a crop of saw logs or other timber products; but it does not offer much encouragement in the way of solving the unemployment problem. Fifty thousand or less men could amply plant all the trees under any expanded program reached by the Government, and the work of these men would be short-lived indeed, since the planting period is limited to three months at the most.

The one hundred and sixty and odd million acres of national forest offer a splendid opportunity for jobs in thinning cut trees, building firebreaks, placing water checks in watercourses to prevent erosion, beautifying the territory adjacent to present roads and trails, building shelters and corrals, lookout points, as well as roads and trails. These are but a few of a long list of jobs that are awaiting the unemployed whenever the Congress is prepared to make direct appropriations for that purpose.

The Forest Service appropriation for 1933 amounts to $21,377,464. Outside of the administration officers, 3,000 year-round men are employed to handle the more than 160,000,000. The rest of the labor is all short-time men. About $12,000,000 out of the total appropriation will be expended for their services.

The period of employment covering this $12,000,000 covers a range from the extreme of one day to six months, but most of the 110,000 men paid out of this sum work but a few weeks, particularly during the fire-fighting season.

We have, then, 12,000,000 spent in the payment of temporary labor.

It is estimated that the temporary labor in the field doing the jobs in the national forest which will tend to conserve and benefit them could be expanded for the year ending July 1, 1933, to the sum of $35,000,000 without having waste or extravagance creeping into the expenditure.

This would be a help, of course, to a man out of a job, for it would give work to tens of thousands, but in order to not hold out false hope to the unemployed in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Detroit, and other large cities of our country, it is only fair that I say these men could be found locally, and, besides, the very nature of the work, particularly its short duration and the impossibility of transporting labor long distance when local men are available, precludes the giving of relief to the men of these cities through Governor Roosevelt's plan of national reforestation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I am firm in the conviction that it is a breach of faith with the American people if we adjourn this Congress without immediately carrying out certain platform pledges made by the Republican and Democratic Parties. Both parties have pledged an international conference to consider the question of silver. Since both parties have promised such a conference, we should by a unanimous vote pass a resolution calling for this conference. There is no reason why the people should wait 17 months and until December, 1933, to receive this relief from a Congress which will be elected this fall on these platforms.

The Republican Party in its platform promises every possible reduction in public expenses. The Democratic Party promises a 25 per cent reduction in public expenses. Since we have placed upon the American people a billion dollars of new forms of taxes, we should immediately give to the American people the economy in government which is promised in the platforms of both parties. Since further economy in government and an international conference on monetary reform is the pledge of both parties, then any Congressman who votes to adjourn until these pledges are fulfilled stands before the country as admitting that these platform pledges are for one purpose and that purpose is to catch votes.

Mr. Chairman, in the first paragraph of the platform of the Democratic Party I find:

> In this time of unprecedented economic and social distress the Democratic Party declares its convictions that the chief causes of this condition were the disastrous policies pursued by our Government since the World War, * * * fostering the merger of competitive businesses into monopolies, * * *.

I am in full accord with the statement of the Democratic Party when it states that "fostering the merger of competitive businesses into monopolies" is one of the principal causes of our present economic and social despair.

Mr. Chairman, the ninth pledge of the Democratic Party in its platform is as follows:

> Strict and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws to prevent monopoly and unfair trade practices and revision thereof for the better protection of labor and the small packer and distributor.

I commend the Democratic Party for this pledge. I am ready to help the Democratic Party make good this pledge. The Democratic Party is in control of the House of Representatives. It is at this moment in a position to pass legislation through the House of Representatives which will revise the antitrust and monopoly laws for the benefit of labor and individual business. The Democratic Party not only has a clear majority in the House of some 10 or 12 Members but in addition to that it can count upon a very substantial support from the Republican membership of this House for such legislation. For my part, I would ask for no greater opportunity to be of service to my country than at this time to join with the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives and vote for such legislation.

If the Democratic Party in the writing of this platform is in good faith and intends to give this legislative protection to the millions of American laboring men and the hundreds of thousands of individual business men, it will immediately proceed through its membership in this House of Representatives to enact such legislation as will revise the antimonopoly laws for the benefit of the individual American citizen.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Democratic membership in the House of Representatives has been in a position since the convening of this Congress last December to enact this antimonopoly legislation, which the Democratic Party now pledges in its platform, the Democratic majority of this House has not submitted or enacted one syllable of legislation which will bring any relief or protection to labor, the small packer, or distributor. On the contrary, the Democratic majority has smothered and refused to consider any such legislation.

Months ago, I introduced in this House H. R. 8930, which was for the purpose of restoring the antimonopoly laws to the full effect and force which they had for over 20 years, and until the so-called rule-of-reason decision by the Supreme Court in the American Tobacco case and the Standard Oil case in 1913. This bill, H. R. 8930, is in keeping with the dissenting opinion of Justice Harlan in those two cases.

Has this Democratic-controlled House of Representatives given any favorable consideration to this bill? It has not. The Democratic-controlled Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives has not only smothered this bill and refused to bring it out for consideration, but it has also refused even to give a hearing on this bill. Furthermore, neither the Democratic-controlled Judiciary Committee, the floor leader of the Democratic membership, nor the Speaker [Mr. GARNER] has supported or submitted this bill or any other bill which will revise the antimonopoly laws for the protection of labor, the small packer, and the distributor.

If the Democratic Party permits an adjournment without keeping its pledge on monopoly legislation, then the Democratic membership in this House is not in accord with the Democrats of the Nation and deserves repudiation in the coming primary and general elections, or else this plank was put into the Democratic platform for no other purpose than to deceive the people and catch votes.

Let me say, in all kindness to the Democratic membership of this House, that there is going to be no way to adjourn this Congress without enacting this legislation and at the same time to fool the people of the South and the West as to your true intentions. Mr. W. K. Henderson, owner and operator of radio station KWKH at Shreveport, La., and an arch foe of monopoly, has the disposition and the ability to take the measure of political duplicity and hypocrisy of politicians and candidates. What is more, with KWKH he has the facilities to convey the report of his measure to the people of the South and of the West. The people of the South and of the West have confidence in the fearlessness and honesty of purpose of Mr. Henderson, while they have little confidence in the courage and good faith of politicians.

On July 6, Mr. Henderson sent a telegram to Governor Roosevelt. He sent to Speaker GARNER and to me a copy of the telegram which he sent to Governor Roosevelt. His telegram to Governor Roosevelt is as follows:

The power of monopoly by which money is centralized is responsible for the present economic stagnation of the country more than all things else combined. The verbiage of the national Democratic platform is not as direct and positive as it should have been, yet I am in sympathy with its limitations on this subject. It had occurred to me that upon the adoption of the platform, your acceptance of the nomination immediately and before the adjournment of the convention, you would insist that Congress remain in session and enact such legislation as would broaden the powers of the Sherman antitrust laws and nullify the action of the Supreme Court wherein it reversed itself in four unanimously rendered decisions through the medium of the "rule of reason."

Congress has the legislative authority to do this and this is conceded and admitted in the decision itself. Immediate action by Congress carrying out the pledge of the Democratic platform in this particular would assure your election in December. The failure of this Congress to act in this particular will be to presume upon the credulity of a knowing public and the knowing people are not at this time going to permit themselves to be deceived or misled. The Democratic leadership of your House is in relation to this question exactly in the position in which you and your address before the convention placed the Republican leadership. You can now, through the power of your position as nominee coupled with the power that goes with the platform, force this legislation before this Congress adjourns. The Democratic leadership has been cooperating and following the Republican leadership. The Democratic masses are not going to follow a party that follows. They prefer to follow the party that leads; and if there is no way to lead the Democratic leadership away from the Republican leadership, there can be but one result in November. Only a declaration that the existing antitrust laws be enforced is a declaration in support of the rule-of-reason decision which is the existing law as applied to monopoly. Party sentiment has no place in these trying hours.

W. K. HENDERSON.

Mr. Henderson is not partisan in this matter. He has praise and support for anyone of any party who is willing to restore the antimonopoly laws of this country to their former power. On the contrary, he has only denunciation and opposition for anyone of any party who is not willing immediately to make legislative provisions for the protection of competitive business in this country from monopoly.

On July 7 I received another telegram from Mr. Henderson, which is as follows:

Sent telegram to President Hoover to-day. I quoted the telegram of yesterday as sent to Governor Roosevelt, and followed with the following message:

"The two dominant issues, or, rather, the two issues which are going to contribute most to the result in November are warped in the monopoly plank of the Democratic Party and the prohibition plank in the platform of both parties. The prohibition plank of the Republican Party is more appealing and more forcibly addresses itself to the intelligent thought of the country as against the Democratic plank, which can only be interpreted as wanting in any opposition to the open saloon. My reference to the prohibition plank must not in any sense be understood as commensurate with what is involved in the attitude of the two parties with reference to monopoly and entrenched wealth. The economic condition of the country is forcing the people of the country to interpret intelligently the causes for this condition. The centralization of money through monopoly has had its day in court with disaster as the result. From this a patriotic righteous judgment should gather much. I am quite sure that the beneficiaries themselves of this system are beginning to see the light of day. Monopolies must have something upon which to feed, and they themselves destroyed their source of supply and are struggling under the weight of their own worthless securities, the fruits of their oppressive gains. The leadership of the Democratic Party in Congress is committed to the control of monopoly as interpreted in the rule-of-reason decision by the Supreme Court of the United States.

"The Democratic platform is not pledged to any hurtful opposition to monopoly. It is pledged only to the enforcement of the antitrust law as interpreted in this rule-of-reason decision. On this question Mr. Roosevelt's stump speech of acceptance at Chicago was a promise of water with two years' grace whilst the house is burning. A message from you to this sitting Congress advising against adjournment until legislation will have been enacted giving equal opportunity to every individual in business unhampered by the power of combined money for the benefit of monopolistic control would leave you in the White House after March 4, 1933. Mr. Roosevelt's criticism and condemnation of Republican leadership was a criticism and condemnation of Democratic leadership; yet he invited and directed the selection of the Speaker of the House as his running mate to aid him in opposition to the Republican leadership. Such inconsistency will not escape American intelligence. No complaint of a longer session in the heated season is any justification for delay.—W. K. Henderson, president Hello-World Broadcasting Corporation."

For the good of the country I appeal to the Democratic membership of this House not to adjourn this Congress until you keep the platform pledge of revisionary legislation of the monopoly laws. This Congress can not adjourn without the consent of this House. The Democratic membership is in the majority in this House. This House can never consent to an adjournment except that the Democratic majority votes and directs that there shall be an adjournment. Let me say to the Democratic membership you can not adjourn this House and fool the people. If you adjourn without passing this antimonopoly legislation, the people will know that your platform pledge pertaining to monopoly legislation is a false promise made for the sole purpose of deceiving the people of the South and of the West. They will know that this pledge was not made for the purpose of giving them any relief, but made solely for the purpose of defrauding them of their votes.

W. K. Henderson has the courage and the patriotism to tell the people of the South and of the West that you adjourned this House, refusing to pass antimonopoly legislation, which your party pledged, after it had solemnly stated to the people that it was its conviction that fostering the merger of competitive businesses into monopolies is the outstanding cause of our present economic and social misery. With KWKH he has the facilities to tell them. He will tell them. They will have confidence in his word, and they will believe it. Your adjourning this Congress without enacting this legislation will be conclusive proof that he is telling them the truth. Let me say to the Democratic membership of this House, if you adjourn before enacting this antimonopoly legislation then you will betray and fail the people by not keeping faith with this antimonopoly plank in your platform.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, the House of Representatives being under Democratic leadership and control in the Seventy-second Congress for the first time in 12 years, or since March 4, 1919, a discussion of the duty and performance of that national leadership seems opportune after seven months of its continuous operation.

SPECIAL FUNCTIONS OF THE HOUSE

The Constitution of the United States provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. It also provides that the Senate may propose or concur in amendments on such bills, as on other bills, but eventually every bill raising revenue originates in the House and after action by the Senate comes back to the House for its concurrence and final action thereon.

It has also become the universal practice, whether by inference or analogy from the Constitution or not, that general appropriation bills originate in the House. In fact, the Ways and Means Committee of the House had exclusive jurisdiction in the House of both revenues and appropriations until 1865, when a separate Committee on Appropriations was created. Subsequently numerous committees received jurisdiction of appropriations for specific departments of the Government, but with the adoption of the present Budget system, a Republican achievement, the single, exclusive Appropriations Committee was again established. The provisions of the Constitution and the practices thereunder doubtless had their origin in the power given the British House of Commons to hold "the purse-strings of the treasury." Just as the Federal Constitution designed that the foreign affairs and relations of the Government should be managed and controlled exclusively by the President and the Senate, so also doubtless it was intended that the House should have and exercise initial control over the fiscal legislation and the financial operations of the Government, with the concurrence and cooperation of the Senate in the matter of amendments and of the President in the matter of veto. It is not claimed by the present speaker that any sort of exclusive jurisdiction was given to the House of Representatives by the Constitution in the matter of appriations, but he does believe that, since the raising of revenues includes both taxing and borrowing, the House should feel special legislative responsibility for maintaining the proper balance between income and outlay and also for maintaining the credit of the United States.

In the present session of Congress there have been two main problems relating to the finances or fiscal affairs of the Federal Government. These problems have involved two general propositions—first, the necessity for raising revenue to take the place of Government income which has failed by reason of the reduced income of the people, who have heretofore paid income and other Federal taxes, and, second, the matter of reducing the expenditures and obligations of the Federal Government as a further necessary accomplishment by the Congress for the purpose of balancing the Budget and of avoiding further increasing of the national debt.

DEMOCRATIC PERFORMANCE IN THE PRESENT HOUSE

During the present Congress the House of Representatives has been controlled by the Democratic Party. While the numerical majority has not been large, the organization has been, or could have been, unusually effective by reason of the known practice of the Democrats in the House to bind their membership by caucus action. In fact, that caucus action has been invoked during this session when certain political objects were sought to be effected and should have been employed as well for the purposes of legislation. If this had been done or sought to be done to any considerable extent, sufficient Republican support was always available for beneficial legislation which failed in the House on account of the disorganization of the majority. These observations apply particularly to the consideration and passage of the revenue act of 1932 and the so-called economy amendment to the legislative department appropriation act, which represented the main efforts of the House Democracy toward balancing the Budget.

The Democratic House has signally failed in its duty and opportunity to legislate wisely upon the fiscal affairs of the Federal Government.

When the Congress convened on December 7, 1931, it was faced with the astounding development that, by reason of reduced tax receipts, the Federal Treasury sustained a deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, of $902,023,828.11 and that a further deficit was estimated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, of $2,122,961,000 and a still further deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, was estimated at $1,420,142,248. Of course, these estimates of deficits for 1932 and 1933 were based upon expectation of ordinary expenditures and did not take into account the unusual items for financial reconstruction and depression relief which have been passed during the present session. The net result necessarily would be that unless expenditures were reduced or new revenues were obtained, the national debt would be increased during the three fiscal years 1931, 1932, and 1933 by the enormous amount of approximately $4,500,000,000. The logical and sensible procedure would have been to ascertain first what reductions or savings might be made in expenditures and then provide new revenues for the balance of the deficits. The condition of the Treasury and the necessity for speedy action to balance the Budget were promptly and forcibly brought to the attention of the legislative branch by the President of the United States at the opening of the Seventy-second Congress. Instead of first considering possible reductions in expenditures, the House began at once the consideration of collecting new revenues.

THE REVENUE ACT OF 1932

The Seventy-second Congress began its deliberations with considerable hope and promise of nonpartisan action on the all-important questions pending before it. The 15 Democrats and 10 Republicans of the Ways and Means Committee began the consideration of the revenue problem with a united determination to prepare an adequate and workable law. The loss in revenue was due entirely to the shrinkage in the income of the people. The national income in 1929 was nearly $90,000,000,000, while during the present year it will not exceed $60,000,000,000. Very evidently this large loss in income has affected large incomes to a greater extent than smaller returns for revenue-producing purposes. Under our recent revenue laws only a small part of the population of the United States has paid any income taxes. In fact, the head of a family with an income of $5,000 or less has paid practically no income tax to the Federal Government. Large income-tax receipts have therefore come from persons with comparatively large incomes and from corporations. It was necessary that the Ways and Means Committee find a substitute for the income taxes thus lost. It was clear that increased income taxes alone would not accomplish this purpose, as the returns would not be ample and as such taxes in turn would reduce the available capital for productive enterprises giving employment to the people. At first the committee sought to reestablish most of the so-called special excise and in some cases "nuisance" taxes imposed during and immediately after the World War. All persons and interests thus proposed to be taxed made vehement protests, and at the same time almost unanimously declared that in view of the situation, which they recognized, they would be willing to take their share of a general sales or producers' tax. The Ways and Means Committee took them at their word. Its members proceeded to prepare a general manufacturers' sales tax which would apply equitably and not oppressively upon all producers and products except the ordinary necessaries of life. The bill thus prepared was admittedly the best proposal of its kind ever submitted to any legislative body. The sales-tax expert from Canada, who gave the committee the benefit of his experience and advice, stated that the committee's bill would be a model for future legislation of its kind and that it had included all the virtues of the Canadian sales tax and avoided all of its vices and shortcomings. The Ways and Means Committee reported this bill to the House unanimously, with but a single reservation on the part of one of its Democratic members.

If the Democratic leadership in the House had taken hold of the situation then and there, this proposal could have been passed. Instead the bark of the committee was cast upon the turbulent sea of the House, where the winds of personal and political advantage, deep-rooted prejudice and fear and timidity threw it about, until finally it sank in the waves of the opposition, drawn in largest numbers from the Democratic majority itself. When the manufacturers' sales tax had been talked to death by unlimited debate in the House, and not until then, the leader of the House, Speaker GARNER, took the floor and rallied the shattered forces for the passage of "some" bill or "any" bill that would balance the Budget. Then came frantic efforts to save the legislation. The majority of the Committee on Ways and Means prepared substitute taxes for the manufacturers' sales tax. These substitutes were themselves all excise or sales taxes, but they applied to certain specially selected products, interests, and institutions, which had to supply the revenue that would have been paid by practically all of the people under the well-considered, nonpartisan, original plan of the Ways and Means Committee. An effort was made in the Senate to rally its membership to the revival of the manufacturers' sales tax, but the attempt met the same fate there as in the House. Eventually an act was passed which theoretically balanced the Budget, but contained all the incongruities and hardships which efforts merely to find revenue from any and every source would naturally produce. Immediately after its enactment the House found it necessary to pass several remedial bills in the interest of the collection of the revenues expected from the measure. Several distinct and urgent hardships and destructive provisions have been brought to the attention of the Congress and its committees, but no opportunity has been afforded for action. Thus, for instance, the ill-considered increase from 1 cent to 5 cents per hundred dollars of valuation of sales for future delivery on produce exchanges has already demoralized the wheat and cotton markets. The tax on bank checks has seriously injured dairy farmers and small tradesmen and is reducing deposits in the banks. The admitted gross hardship upon estates of decedents caused by the depreciation of securities and other values since the boom period was not relieved, although a very fair and just provision to that end was contained in the bill as it passed the House. The excessive rates in the income and estate tax schedules will in all probability not produce the revenues expected. It is fairly certain that Congress will have to pass new legislation to obtain the revenue thus failing, either in the short session of the present Congress or shortly thereafter. It is a safe guess that some system like the manufacturers' sales tax proposed by the Ways and Means Committee will eventually have to be adopted. Firm and courageous, not to say well-directed leadership could have placed that proposal on the statute books and would have saved the Democratic House leadership from the humiliation of defeat and the country from an ill-considered revenue law.

THE "ECONOMY" PROGRAM

Equally unsuccessful and abortive was the effort of the Democratic House management to pass an economy bill for the reduction of expenditures in response to the universal popular demand. With great eclat a special Economy Committee was appointed, which received privileged status to report bills at any time and which started out with a pretentious program for slashing appropriations. The creation of this committee was clearly a move to circumvent the request of the President for complete authority to cut expenditures by administrative and Executive action. The plea was that Congress should not surrender its powers, but should demonstrate its own ability to handle this important matter. Instead of offering independent legislation that would have stood or fallen on its own merits, the Economy Committee, with the timely assistance of the Committee on Rules, submitted an amendment to the legislative department appropriation bill, which was heralded as insuring savings in appropriations and expenditures amounting to $200,000,000. When the Democratic majority in the House had worked its will as best it could, the net result of the economy amendment was a total annual saving in expenditures of $45,000,000. The Senate came to the rescue of the House leadership, so that eventually the economy amendment provided retrenchment in expenditures of $150,000,000 for the single fiscal year of 1933. The legislation gives the President the authority he sought to work out economies, but curtails his power by requiring that his plans for reorganization of Federal activities can not be put into operation until the Congress has had a chance to disapprove them. Congress is given 60 legislative days in which it may countermand the orders and plans of the President.

This Congress has, to a limited extent, reduced the appropriations for the ordinary purposes of the Government for the fiscal year 1933 below the corresponding appropriations for the fiscal year 1932. Some of our Democratic friends have made extravagant and misleading claims as to the economy thus effected. Comparisons have been made between the total appropriations for the fiscal year 1932 as compared with those for 1933, and on this basis economies or reductions in expenditures have been claimed as high as the enormous sum of approximately $1,400,000,000. Included in this alleged "saving" are the items of $500,000,000 appropriated in 1932 for the capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, $101,900,000 for the Federal Farm Board, $22,000,000 for farmers' seed loans, and $125,000,000 for the capital stock of Federal land banks, totaling $748,900,000 of appropriations made for the fiscal year 1932 which are of extraordinary character and, of course, were not repeated in the appropriations for 1933. This claim also does not include the reductions in appropriations for 1933 recommended by the President through the Bureau of the Budget. When these items are eliminated, it will be found that the actual reductions for the ordinary expenditures of the Government in the various appropriation acts for 1933 were only $184,294,000 below the Budget estimates. Of course, these and similar parings will not bring any large or permanent retrenchment in the cost of the Federal establishment. There is only one way in which any considerable and permanent reduction of the Federal Budget can be obtained. That is by dismantling and discontinuing activities, services, bureaus, boards, and commissions which are performing functions not strictly or necessarily of Federal character or even contemplated by the Constitution of the United States. They have been established on the ground that they promote the "general welfare" of the people in many relations and include services and interests which have widespread sympathy and support throughout the country. Broadly speaking, these services and interests are: Public health; education; conservation of national resources; aids to agriculture, labor, industry, trade, aviation, and the merchant marine; and public buildings and public parks. It would be possible to curtail the activities of many of these departments and bureaus and to permanently eliminate some of them from the National Budget; but doubtless vehement and voluminous protests would arise from large groups and many individuals who are directly benefited by the maintenance of these activities.

If the campaign for any considerable reduction of Federal taxation is to succeed, it must address itself to the objects and purposes for which taxes are collected and spent, not merely to possible efficiency and economy in the use of appropriations or in the expenditure of taxes. The appropriations themselves must be eliminated, not merely curtailed or controlled. These trees in the National Treasury forest must be uprooted and destroyed, not merely trimmed and conserved for future growth. To attain these ends the present Congress has not even taken the first steps. The Democratic control in the House has shown no interest in such a purpose or procedure. Its efforts to balance the Budget have been directed merely and entirely to meet an immediate and temporary emergency.

PRESIDENT HOOVER TAXPAYERS' ONLY HOPE

The only hope of the Federal taxpayer for permanant relief from his onerous burdens lies in the President of the United States, to whom Congress should grant the authority, sought by him, without interference even by Congress itself, to reduce expenditures and advance efficiency in the executive departments, which are constitutionally under his management. The Democratic majority in the House has planned no permanent or considerable tax reduction by legislation, but it did strenuously oppose the President's program for retrenchment.

President Hoover has a consistent record in advocacy and support of the reorganization and consolidation of Federal activities in the interest of economy. The subject has challenged his attention since he entered the Cabinet of President Harding on March 5, 1921. On April 16, 1921, he made a notable address on the subject before the Council of Engineers in Philadelphia and called attention to the multiplicity and overlapping of Federal bureaus and departments. On January 22, 1924, in testifying before a joint committee of Congress, he said:

> I wish to emphasize that in reorganization the important thing is to assemble the various functions of Government according to purpose.

In his testimony at that time he outlined a comprehensive system for coordination and reorganization. Referring to the so-called independent establishments, not under Cabinet heads but responsible directly either to the President or to the Congress, Mr. Hoover characterized them as—

> The floating islands of authority, technically anchored but sometimes actually responsible to nobody.

On another occasion he said that—

> Every single department, bureau, board, or whatever it may be called, in the entire Government, should be placed on the operating table and a clean-cut separation established between semijudicial and semilegislative functions on the one hand and of administration on the other.

If President Hoover is afforded the authority and opportunity which he has besought Congress to give him to reorganize and reduce Government establishments, real economy and efficiency may confidently be expected to result. The present Congress showed a partisan and narrow spirit in not granting him such full and untrammeled power to reform the administrative departments, which, after all, are under the constitutional jurisdiction of the Executive.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, on December 17 last, I introduced House Resolution 68, which was referred to the Committee on Rules. It provided that the Committee on Banking and Currency be authorized and directed to investigate the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks, and such members of the Federal reserve system as may be necessary in their activities with respect to foreign banks and foreign central banks, their open-market operations and acceptance business, and their connection with the American Acceptance Council and their collaboration with other banks, American and foreign, in the operations of such banks and foreign financing and for the purpose of this investigation that the committee make an audit of the books of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks in connection therewith. I have repeatedly been asking the chairman of the Committee on Rules for action on this resolution. Up to this time I have had nothing but courteous replies. I say to the membership of this House, and particularly to the responsible leadership, that there is no more important matter pending before this Congress than consideration of this resolution. Only to-day the majority leader made a statement on the floor of this House which confirmed a prediction that I made on the floor of the House and have repeatedly made during the past three years, to the effect that the Young plan would not be carried out. On December 15 I referred to matters pertaining to the operation of the Federal reserve system which can not be ignored by the responsible leadership in this House. Again, the other day, June 10, I made a speech dealing with the Federal reserve, which can not be ignored. I rise now to call attention of the leadership of this House to the fact that this Congress should not adjourn until they give consideration to this resolution.

I call attention also to another resolution and I am prompted to do so somewhat by the discussion relative to the deficit which has taken place in this House to-day. I call attention to House Resolution 249 which I introduced on June 4, 1932, the same day that I made a speech on the floor of this House, and pointed out the fact that there was a large volume of uncollected taxes pending before the Bureau of Internal Revenue of the Treasury Department.

A lot of those taxes are being fraudulently withheld, and I pointed out the reasons for it and asked in this resolution that a committee be appointed and directed to investigate and determine the amount of income and excess-profits taxes which have been fraudulently evaded, either with or without the knowledge of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and to investigate and determine the exact amount of income and excess-profits taxes which the Bureau of Internal Revenue failed to collect by the unconstitutional and illegal withdrawal of Attorneys General's opinions, and I cited these various opinions. I again call attention of the leadership of this House, and particularly do I call the Speaker's attention to this particular resolution, and in doing so I desire to call your attention to a speech made in this House on December 16, 1930, by the Hon. JOHN N. GARNER, now Speaker of the House of Representatives, in which he set forth the total internal-revenue receipts from 1917 to 1930, a total of 14 years, at $44,032,371,357, and also total income, excess-profits, and estate tax receipts for the same period as $33,794,833,701. He also set out refunds, credits, and abatements of internal-revenue taxes a total of $3,450,434,392; the abatements, however, only covered a period of 9 years of the 14 years. The statement also showed additional assessments and collections of internal-revenue taxes for the same period totaling $5,345,202,277.

And after analyzing very carefully the collection of these taxes and the payment of these refunds, and so forth, Mr. GARNER said—and I quote now from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> I just want the House to understand this situation, and especially my Republican brethren, as to how much dependence can be placed upon statements of the Treasury Department, based upon any statistics it gives.
> Mr. GOLDER. Is there anything to indicate that any of the refunds which are made are improperly or illegally made?
>
> Mr. GARNER. I think there is, sir.
> Mr. GOLDER. Will the gentleman produce it?
> Mr. GARNER. Produce it? Give me an opportunity to investigate the Treasury Department, and I will do it.
> Mr. GOLDER. The gentleman apparently has that power.
> Mr. GARNER. No; I have not. If you will give me that power with your vote, I will attend to the job very quickly.

And again, on May 26, 1930, on the floor of this House, as recorded on page 9572 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 72, part 9, the Seventy-first Congress, second session, Mr. GARNER said:

> Several weeks ago I introduced a resolution authorizing an investigation of the Treasury Department in connection with these tax refunds, and that resolution has never been reported by the committee to which it was referred. I believe that in view of this decision of the Court of Claims the resolution should be acted upon and Congress informed as to the reason and motives of the Treasury Department in granting these refunds without a court decision.
> The $33,000,000 refund to the United State Steel Corporation was approved by the majority members of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation in March. Since that time refunds aggregating $5,845,052.75 have been approved by the Treasury Department, and it is interesting to note that of this amount $3,435,948 represents refunds to Pennsylvania corporations.
> I believe that the great mass of American taxpayers, upon whom the burden of these enormous refunds must fall, are entitled to demand of Congress and the Treasury Department that these matters be submitted to the courts for adjudication. The fallacy of the rule applied by the Treasury Department has been made evident by the decision of the Court of Claims, and it is obvious that a halt must be called, a thorough investigation made, and rules established upon a sound basis by the courts.

I call the attention now of our Speaker, and in no critical manner whatsoever but as concurring with what I am proposing, that now, under his leadership, he has the opportunity to investigate under my resolution that which he has already said should be investigated. If the Treasury will collect the taxes that are now due, there will be no deficit in the Budget.

Mr. O'CONNOR. To what committee was that resolution referred?

Mr. McFADDEN. The Rules Committee.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I still have the same opinion I expressed at that time. The reasons I have not pressed on the Rules Committee the investigation demanded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania are two. For the last six months the country has been very much disturbed in economic matters. I did not want to investigate the Treasury Department with a view to having the people of the country lose confidence in it. The only thing they seem to have left is confidence in the Government of the United States, in its fiscal matters. To make an investigation at this time and discover such things as the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I believe would be discovered in that department would certainly unsettle that confidence and would not be beneficial to the American people.

Secondly, I thought if we understook to do it at this time, with an election immediately in front of us, it would be charged during the campaign that we attempted to use the investigation for partisan purposes.

Those are the two reasons why I did not ask for it to be done.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am very glad that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] agrees with me, and I am just as much concerned as the gentleman is, as regards the confidence of the public; but I do want to say, in addition, that if there is anything that the public wants, it is the light turned on. That is why they have not confidence to-day.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. In view of what the Speaker has said, and speaking as he does as the Speaker of this House and as a vice presidential candidate, his views should carry great weight to the country. The Speaker has said that he does not want this investigation for the simple reason that he believes, in substance, that it would develop corruption and fraud in the Treasury Department. In other words, this man in this high position tells the country that, in his judgment, there is fraud and corruption in the Treasury Department, and he says that if the country were to learn that at this time, it might have a bad effect upon the country.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. MICHENER. When I have finished my statement. I have the floor.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; the gentleman has the floor, but the gentleman ought not misquote me for the RECORD.

Mr. MICHENER. I am not misquoting the gentleman at all.

Mr. GARNER. I did not say "corruption and fraud." I challenge the stenographic report to show that.

Mr. MICHENER. But there are some of us who have some rights sometimes when we have been yielded to.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; but the gentleman has no right to make misstatements.

Mr. MICHENER. The Speaker makes a statement from his platform and we can not answer it, but when the Speaker takes the privilege of coming on to the floor it seems to me he is on the same level as any other man on the floor. I do not want to misquote the Speaker. I will not change my remarks in the RECORD, and I ask that the Speaker do not change his remarks, so that they will speak for themselves.

What I want to say is that I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] that if this fraud does exist it should be investigated; and if the Speaker of the House wants to say to the country that he believes that it does exist and he fears that the divulging of the existence of the fraud would be detrimental to the country, I say it is much better that we divulge this fraud and clean it up, if there is fraud, rather than to say to the country we know it is there but we are afraid to divulge it.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McFADDEN. Certainly. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. I used neither the word "corruption" nor "fraud," but I said I was afraid that a revelation of the condition existing in the Treasury—and I used the word "condition," and I will not change my remarks—would have a bad effect upon the country. However, let me say to the gentleman from Michigan, the leader on that side of the House, that if his side of the House is now willing to appoint a committee for the purpose of investigating the Treasury Department, including the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal reserve system, I think I can speak for the majority side of the House that we will pass a resolution to-morrow or Monday creating that committee and give them ample funds to make this investigation. Now, if the gentlemen on that side want an investigation made, we will make it. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. In answer to the gentleman from Texas, I will say the gentleman confers upon me an honor, in language, to which I am not entitled. The leader of the minority, Mr. SNELL, is not present. I am speaking in my individual capacity and only spoke after the gentleman's statement, and I want it to be understood that I am not speaking for anyone but myself. Personally, I should prefer an investigation to a statement by one in responsible position that corruption does exist.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Speaking in his individual capacity and as a member of the Rules Committee, will the gentleman assist in bringing out a rule and passing it on the floor of this House?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; I think I will.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that the Rules Committee meets at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Speaking as far as I may for the majority, I request them to bring out the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], put it on its passage, and make this investigation. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Speaking as one Member of the House and upon my own responsibility, I believe that the Rules Committee, if and when it acts upon this matter, should make some preliminary ascertainment of facts, and not base its action merely upon the language of a resolution which may have been introduced; and I am satisfied if the Rules Committee will do that, there will not be found to be any good reason for making the investigation upon the basis of the results.

Mr. MICHENER. Well, I take it the Speaker is to appear before the Rules Committee in the usual custom, and give the facts upon which he basis his charges. Of course, we would not think of reporting out a rule—not a Democratic Member would think of reporting out a rule—unless the Speaker or some one responsible, who makes the charges, does come before the committee and make his assertion.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. I desire to state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania several times has made direct charges against the Treasury Department, as well as against the Federal reserve system. I believe that the resolution asking for an investigation should receive favorable consideration, but, due to the wishes of the Speaker, who feared that it might affect the stability and what little confidence there was left in the administration, I desisted in demanding favorable action on that resolution. But I think the gentleman has submitted enough proof on which the Rules Committee could act.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. As an individual Member of the House, I hope the Rules Committee will meet to-morrow and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the distinguished Republican [Mr. McFADDEN], and the gentleman from Texas, the distinguished Democrat [Mr. GARNER], will both appear before that committee with some concrete evidence, justifying their statements on the floor of the House to-day, and that the Rules Committee will consider that evidence and bring the resolution to the House for action, either adversely or favorably, so that we can have the evidence that both of the gentlemen have and vote upon it. It will be better for the country, better for the Treasury, and for all concerned than to adjourn, as the Democratic majority wanted to adjourn, over to-morrow.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS].

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose, and shall not be, to take the floor for any political discussion, but rather for a discussion of why the House went into the Committee of the Whole here to discuss the President's message on the second deficiency bill. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that when that bill was up for consideration in the House on June 9, 1932, as shown at pages 12485 and 12486 of the RECORD, I was privileged to have a little debate with the chairman of the Appropriations Committee on the reasons as to why the Appropriations Committee left out an item of $120,000 for the continuation of the so-called Gifford unemployment relief committee. I read these excerpts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date:

Mr. Goss. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment, for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the Bureau of the Budget recommended an item of $90,000 for salaries to carry on the work of the President's Unemployment Relief Committee, as well as an item of $24,000 for contingent expenses and an item of $6,000 for printing and binding. I notice the Appropriations Committee has refused to appropriate for any of the matters affecting unemployment relief, which Mr. Gifford and Mr. Owen D. Young have been heading for the past few months and have done an excellent job. I want to know if the chairman can inform the committee why the Committee on Appropriations left those appropriations out of the bill?

Mr. BYRNS. The very best reason I can offer the gentleman is that there was no law authorizing it, and it was so admitted by the gentlemen who appeared before the committee in support of the estimate. If these items had been reported, they would have been subject to points of order.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Goss. Does not the gentleman know about the unemployment situation and agree that something should be done?

Mr. BYRNS. I do; but can the gentleman tell me one single thing this Gifford Employment Commission has done looking to the relief of unemployment?

Mr. Goss. Yes; many things. It raised funds in the various local communities to help those local communities take care of their own unemployment. They have done it in my district. They ran the Army and Navy football game in New York City for unemployment relief.

Mr. BYRNS. Are we going to spend $120,000 for a commission to run an Army and Navy football game?

Mr. Goss. No. The gentleman is facetious in that remark. They have done a good job all over the country.

Mr. BYRNS. The funds to which the gentleman refers were raised by local communities, and those funds could have been raised, and doubtless would have been raised, by those local communities without the establishment of an illegal and unauthorized employment commission. We have an employment commission in the Department of Labor. Why have another employment commission in the Department of Commerce?

Mr. Goss. Simply to follow up and help in this unemployment-relief program.

Mr. BYRNS. That is the trouble with these departments of the Government; there is so much duplication of service that it is impossible for anybody to know just what is being done, and that is one reason for the enormous increase of expenditure.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. Goss. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. Goss. Then the only reason why your committee did not bring this in was because it was subject to a point of order?

Mr. BYRNS: Oh, no. I am not speaking for the other members of the committee, but I want to say to the gentleman that I think that was a useless expenditure of money and that I do not believe it ought to be carried on next year. Certainly when there is no authority of law for it the committee would not have been justified in bringing it in.

Mr. HART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Goss. Yes.

Mr. HART. As a member of the Appropriations Committee I voted to exclude it because I thought it was a waste of money.

Mr. Goss. The gentleman does not think Mr. Young or Mr. Gifford have done anything toward the relief of unemployment?

Mr. HART. Mr. Young and Mr. Gifford put in no bill for their services.

Mr. Goss. But there are 108 employees working without any compensation at all, and there is more or less of a skeleton organization over the country.

Mr. BYRNS. Does not the gentleman know we have the United States Employment Service?

Mr. Goss. I know that, and it does a fine service.

Mr. BYRNS. Then why have one in the Department of Commerce? Is not the Department of Labor the proper place in the Government for that activity?

Mr. Goss. My information is that this agency is doing a different class of work from that of the Federal employment service in the Department of Labor.

In questioning the chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], he felt that there was no need for this particular service any longer, and yet I find on the 5th of July the President of the United States sent a message to us requesting an appropriation of $120,000 to continue this relief committee.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman know what the $120,000 was requested for?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that most of it was for salaries?

Mr. GOSS. Yes. I will come to that. I will answer the gentleman. I may say right now that $90,000 of the $120,000 was for salaries, $24,000 was for contingent expenses, and $6,000 was for printing.

In this connection I wish to quote from the message of the President of July 5:

This organization, of which Mr. Walter S. Gifford is director, is comprised of leading men and women throughout every State in the Union and has served to establish and coordinate State and local volunteer effort in relief of distress throughout the Nation. The organization has secured in a large way the cooperation of industry and labor, of the national social-welfare organizations, and has assisted in mobilizing a large amount of voluntary funds and administering local resources to the best advantage. This organization is the only agency for national coordination and stimulation for the multitude of voluntary efforts and a clearing to these thousands of organizations with suggestions and methods for the alleviation of unemployment distress.

Should this organization be discontinued, not only would its important functions of stimulation of private giving and coordination be destroyed, but there would be grave danger of national, State, and local volunteer groups concluding that services such as they have rendered were no longer necessary. Voluntary effort amongst our people is of far more importance both morally and financially than the direct aid of local or other governmental agencies. To demobilize this organization might easily create widespread confusion and bring great hardships when the need is greatest.

It is obviously of the utmost importance that no action be taken which shall in any way diminish voluntary efforts which combine the intimate knowledge of local conditions with the sense of responsibility toward fellow citizens and neighbors in distress. Continuance of this organization with its background of experience is, in my opinion, most essential to the intelligent carrying out of the provisions of all relief activities, whether private or public.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that there were 108 volunteer citizens of this country in some 40 States who have been serving with this commission besides the clerks—I believe there are 35—to whom the Federal Government is paying these salaries mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McDUFFIE. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GOSS. Certainly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The question is not how much is being paid in salaries to the people on the pay roll but what are the results obtained by this commission?

Mr. GOSS. I shall be pleased to tell the gentleman what my own experience was in connection with this.

The Gifford committee took the place of the President's so-called emergency committee in August of 1931, true, without the authority of Congress, and that is what made the deficiency appropriation of $120,000 necessary as requested to the Bureau of the Budget this year.

Now I want to call the gentleman's attention to some of the things this committee has actually done.

In the field of social welfare and relief, the organization has cooperated actively with numerous groups, such as the Family Welfare Association of America, the Association of Community Chests and Councils, the National Association of Public Welfare Officials, the National Association of Travelers' Aid Societies, and the Red Cross. The organization has also worked closely with more than 200 national associations, fraternal societies, and service clubs.

In its function as a clearing house for information which may prove helpful to national, State, and local agencies engaged in the relief of unemployment distress, the organization has had prepared for and distributed to these groups a number of guidance reports and bulletins dealing with such subjects as made work, homeless men, homeless women, transient families, organization and administration of public-relief agencies, made work for white-collar unemployed, collection and distribution of clothing for relief, and so forth.

The organization has strongly recommended that commercial and industrial concerns increase employment opportunities by spreading work. A number of bulletins have been issued describing the methods and experiences of a large number of companies in dividing available work among as many employees as possible, thereby reducing materially the number who would otherwise have to apply for charity.

The organization has also developed a number of special projects. During recent months the importance of subsistence gardens as a relief measure has been stressed. A bulletin describing garden programs followed successfully in 1931 by many communities and industrial organizations has been issued and distributed to local unemployment-relief committees and other organizations throughout the country. In cooperation with the agricultural-extension service in five States, the organization has been interested in the development of an experimental subsistence-garden program in connection with industrial employment. Those five States are Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia. At the present time a program for the conservation of surplus fruits and vegetables is being prepared and a bulletin will be issued.

Through cooperation with the United States Office of Education, emphasis is being placed upon the need of schools to develop or expand in night schools, vocational classes, and so forth, so that they may be of greater assistance to the unemployed. Recently reports have been received from some 300 superintendents showing a large number of unemployed men and women enrolling in such schools.

A report giving a cross section of the experience in this field is being prepared and will be distributed to State, county, and local superintendents of schools throughout the country.

Another fundamental problem pressing for the attention of emergency-relief committees is to provide for the satisfactory use of the free time of the unemployed. To this end many communities, in addition to offering opportunities for educational and vocational training, are carrying on recreational activities. A bulletin has recently been issued to unemployment-relief committees, presenting a suggested community program for recreational activities, prepared at the request of our organization by the American Library Association, Boys' Clubs of America, Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, Jewish Welfare Board, Knights of Columbus, the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the National Federation of Settlements, and the National Recreation Association.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman spoke about the Gifford committee not being an efficient committee.

Mr. GOSS. I said it was not authorized by law.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is what I meant; not authorized by law.

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. And that was responsible for the deficiency.

Mr. GOSS. That is the reason.

Mr. BRIGGS. I was wondering how the gentleman coupled up the deficiency with this committee attempting to carry on the operations indicated.

Mr. GOSS. The President appointed this commission, I will say to the gentleman from Texas, during the absence of Congress, on account of the unemployment emergency; and at the time he appointed this committee, of course, he had to have funds to carry on the work; and that is why it came in, as the gentleman knows, in a deficiency bill and why it was recommended this year.

Now, I want to call attention to what has happened, and a lot of it, I admit frankly, can not be seen. A lot of this work is in addition to the work in the usual Federal employment agencies throughout the States and should not be confused with their usual work.

I want to call attention to the fact that in the schools throughout the United States they have held night sessions for vocational training during their three hours to instruct these people who have been out of employment. Again, along the lines of vocational education, they have cooperated with the Young Men's Christian Associations, the Knights of Columbus, and all kinds of charitable organizations.

In order to help purely local situations, they put out different bulletins, and I want to refer to my own home city for a moment to show how it has operated there.

We got up little groups, and in our city we have not had to expend any city funds, and yet we have raised and expended on unemployment something between a million and a million and a half dollars toward relief this last year; and our distinguished mayor, Hon. T. Frank Hayes, a Democrat—and a lot of credit is due to him in the work that he accomplished—brought up this idea of cooperation with these committees, because I happen to know that he cooperated with this unemployment commission here in Washington, and each one who was working was given an opportunity to contribute 1 per cent of his wages up to and including those who earned $50 a week; 1½ per cent from $50 to $75; 2 per cent from $75 to $100; and 3 per cent over $100 a week; the factories, stores, and various industries have matched dollar for dollar that raised by the employees. It was a very small amount. A person earning $50 a week contributed only 50 cents. But it has relieved the unemployment situation. I am informed it has relieved all the people in dire distress. It has all been expended on public improvements after having an investigation made of the needs of the various classes who needed this type of work. That is the line along which this commission has been cooperating throughout the country.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does not the gentleman think that those fine results, of which he has spoken, could have been obtained without this expenditure from the Federal Government?

Mr. GOSS. I will be frank and say that it is possible they might have been obtained, but at the same time it is very difficult in these local communities to set up an organization and have the people cooperate unless there is some head to the whole situation throughout the country. When the bill was under consideration I felt that this work should be continued, but enough Members disagreed with me to prevent the appropriation of the amount necessary to continue the work.

Mr. McDUFFIE. This is the committee that originated under the chairmanship of one Colonel Wood, is it not?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does the gentleman know why the colonel quit?

Mr. GOSS. No.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Is it not a fact that the colonel thought it was a useless expenditure of public funds and that is the reason he quit?

Mr. GOSS. I can not answer the gentleman's question, because I do not know. However, I do know this, that after Mr. Gifford became chairman of the commission, in conjunction with Mr. Owen D. Young and various others of this executive group, millions of dollars were raised through the running of football games, charitable entertainments, and what not. In this way unemployment has been relieved in local places. When we have been considering unemployment relief to the extent of $2,000,000,000, and so on, I think $120,000 would be a paltry sum to appropriate for the continuance of an activity as worth while as this seems to me to be. I have been in close contact with the work at home and throughout my district. I think the bulletins and suggestions which have been handed out under the leadership of this commission have been very helpful. You can not say how much relief it has actually given, but I think the work this commission has done has been very helpful in relieving distress in local communities.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What is the status of this item now?

Mr. GOSS. The status is this: As the second deficiency bill came into the House it was minus this $120,000 appropriation which was asked for through the Bureau of the Budget. There were hearings on it before the Appropriations Committee, and the gentleman can find those hearings on page 66 of the hearings on the second deficiency bill.

When the bill was under consideration I asked the chairman of the committee [Mr. BYRNS] why that appropriation was not included. He stated it was not included because he felt it was not required. The bill passed the House and Senate without having that amount included, and the President is now asking us to appropriate this money, and I think it is worth while. [Applause.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC] may have permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, there are times when nearly every Member of Congress has had to participate in a strenuous campaign. During the present session I have been confronted with a situation that has brought to me the kind of experience that I never before witnessed. The financial condition of the Nation has been at its lowest ebb, which has caused a period of unrest to the extent that many of our worthy citizens did not know what was best to do; however, in all my public addresses I have tried to acquaint those whom I have the honor of representing with facts connected with present conditions, in order that they might realize some of the causes that have brought about the present depression.

I know that the citizens of the seventh congressional district rate in intelligence as high as those who reside in any other section of the United States, and that they are sufficiently posted to know who is to blame for present conditions. I also feel that when my people ascertain the real cause of all this distress that they will be fair enough to place the responsibility where it rightfully belongs.

The Democratic Party went out of power in 1920. During the eight years that it was in control of the Government there was more progressive legislation enacted into law than in any other similar period in the history of the Nation. Furthermore, our citizens during this period enjoyed a greater era of prosperity than ever before. Farm products sold for higher prices. The laborer received more for his services, and there was reflected to every occupation a period of prosperity. Since this period the Republican Party has had a President in the White House, and it being the duty of the President to include in his message to Congress recommendations relating to needed laws, his party must share the responsibility for not bringing to the attention of the lawmaking bodies measures in the interest of the public.

In the speeches that I have made in the District, attention has been called to the need for certain laws, with the hope that the President and the heads of the various departments would join with the lawmakers in giving proper relief to the people. However, it is to be regretted that big business and those who occupy high positions in financial circles are about the only ones that have been able to get the ear of the President, as apparently his idea of bringing about better conditions has been to start at the top and work down, instead of beginning at the bottom and working up.

As secretary of the special Agricultural Committee in the House of Representatives, interested in agriculture, I have spoken before the committee, conferred with our party leaders, called together the representatives of the farm organizations, and in every way in my power tried to bring the kind of pressure to bear that would cause the enactment of an emergency farm bill which would provide the cost of production on that part of the yield needed for home consumption. This plan is sound; for if the Nation did not produce that which is needed to feed and clothe the people, it would be necessary to purchase the same abroad. Everyone knows that the source of all wealth is in the ground and unless the producers can obtain cost of production, it will be impossible to reflect a healthy condition to the other occupations. Therefore, notwithstanding the fact the President, the Farm Board, and the Secretary of Agriculture, whose duty it is to support needed legislation, have failed to recommend a bill of this kind to Congress, it has been possible to get the three farm organizations to support this principle, and I am hoping that the people everywhere will consider the facts and place the blame where it justly belongs, as no law can be passed when vetoed by the President unless there can be had a two-thirds vote, and my party has only a majority in the House of Representatives.

Over 30 nations have abandoned the gold standard and substituted silver. The United States formerly enjoyed a fine trade from most of these nations. The silver dollar is worth less than 50 cents, and these countries would be penalized from 30 to 50 cents on the dollar, or the difference in the value in gold, in carrying on trade relations with countries now on a gold standard. I take the position that a new policy should be put into effect with respect to money by using two metals, namely, gold and silver, with a fixed ratio, thus enabling the United States to resume trade relations with these nations, using the silver ratio as a basis for the exchange. I feel that the adoption of such a law will open up our markets, thus enabling a larger percentage of our surplus products to be disposed of and at the same time bring about friendly relations with all nations.

Nearly everyone realizes that some of our meritorious citizens can not pay their taxes this year and that the future does not hold out very much hope when it is known that the farm products are going to be sold for prices lower than cost of production. Many will not be able to pay the storekeeper, take up their notes at the banks, and retire the payments that are due the mortgage companies; therefore, I am in favor of a law which would allow a meritorious landowner to obtain loans at a low rate of interest, covering a long period of years, based upon a fair appraisal of the property, having in mind that funds could be obtained either from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Postal Savings, or the Federal reserve banking system. Such a law, if advisable, would provide for the issuing of money against such security, enabling our currency to be inflated, thereby serving a double purpose.

I regret exceedingly that the President of the United States came out against the payment of the soldiers' bonus or adjusted compensation. Everyone knows that during the war labor received from $5 to $20 per day, when our soldiers were only being paid $1.25 per day. This being an appreciative Government, a law was passed to adjust the difference in pay, and these soldiers were given an adjusted certificate amounting to approximately $1 per day covering their services. The Government has promised this money to them. I take the position that the payment of over $2,000,000,000 at this time would do more to bring relief to the entire Nation than practically anything else, as this money would be distributed to every section of the Nation, thus causing the same to flow into channels that have not been touched by laws passed during the session. I spoke in favor of this bill and voted for same on final passage. It is to be regretted that the Republican Senate killed it, thus denying the relief that was so badly needed now. During the discussion of this bill I called attention to the fact that in many theaters in the Nation a retired Army general made a vicious talking picture, suggesting by inference that the Army should be called on to run the ex-service men, who were then at Washington, out of the city. This Army officer, in my opinion, represents the type that did their fighting about 25 miles behind the line. Anyhow, I venture to say that certain of these officers have enough medals to fill a half-bushel basket because of the record made by the men who were at the front, and that some never got close enough to smell gunpowder.

I resent the "dog-in-the-manger" attitude assumed by him and others. I know that these splendid lads were not tramps or beggars, but good citizens out of employment, out of food, out of clothes, seeking the payment of that which has been promised them. Therefore, regardless of what the President favors, the capitalistic-owned press and others have said in the way of criticism, I have stuck with them and will continue to stick so long as they conduct themselves in a proper way.

During my service, as much if not more consideration has come to the seventh congressional district as to any other similar district in the United States. I dare say there is more public-building construction, giving employment to labor, now going on than in many other districts. I feel that the ex-service men and their dependents have been taken care of in the best manner possible. I know that a deaf ear has never been turned to any worthy cause, and that every letter received has been answered, taking care of the wishes of the writer as promptly as possible. I have aided in the passage and enactment of the first road law, which caused the Government to match dollar for dollar with the States; and Oklahoma has received benefits from this act amounting to over $30,000,000. I have aided in the passage of the land bank law, which has saved thousands of dollars to my people in the way of interest charges. I supported the first immigration law, which protects our country from being flooded with those who would be classed as undesirables.

The vocational training act, which benefits the underprivileged, the hospitalization bill for disabled veterans, the adjusted compensation act, and those that relate to benefits for the widows and orphans likewise have received my support. I have aided in the passage of hundreds of important bills, and no person can point to a single law that I have voted for that was not of benefit to the district and the Nation. This must be true, as I have never heard any opponent criticizing any votes that I have cast during my term of office. Therefore, everyone must realize that my every act has been in the interest of the district, and it is on this record I am asking for reelection to my present position. During my service, on two occasions, I have been most severely attacked because of a fight put up to save the taxpayers from being penalized to the extent of several billion dollars. At one time it was proposed to authorize the expenditure of over $4,000,000,000, which would have been directly beneficial to the steel corporations and shipbuilding corporations. In the best way I knew I fought this measure, and it did not become a law; however, I was made to suffer humiliation because of a dirty, foul, underhanded attack made upon me for the purpose of ruining my reputation. My conscience was clear—I knew that I had committed no wrong, and, instead of remaining quiet, when I found out the source of these charges the "fur certainly did fly," and the guilty party looked like a sheep-killing dog when I referred to him as a rattlesnake and a skunk.

I asked the Post Office Department to use their secret-service men and make a complete check of the charges, and the cleanest exoneration that was ever written came from this source, and it is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Again during this session I opposed in every way I knew the proposed authorization of $610,000,000 which would have been beneficial to this same class. The bill did not become a law, but I got one of the worst skinnings that was ever printed by a chain of newspapers that are favorable to big business. I do not know who is furnishing the money that has been expended for the purpose of trying to defeat me. On numerous occasions during this campaign I have had individuals tell me they were offered pretty near their own price to work against me. Some one has furnished this cash, and you can realize when a public servant has had to fight the kind of interests that made millions of dollars out of Government contracts that they would be glad to donate several thousands of dollars to remove the stumbling block out of the way. Yet I am convinced that there are a sufficient number of well-meaning citizens in the district that will not allow their minds to be poisoned by this propaganda that may have been bought and paid for by contributions coming from those who have been exposed and shown up when they were engaged in a practice that would not stand the light of day.

There has been directed against me a campaign of misrepresentation. A regular campaign of whispering, poison political mongers, going about the country, most always under cover, hardly ever in the open, telling old political lies and adding to them new ones as fast as fertile brain could conceive them, trying to make mountains out of the molehills, telling just common, ordinary lies. I have endeavored to make a clean campaign and base my claim for reelection upon my own record in the National House of Representatives and not upon the demerits of any other person. I have endeavored at all times to take care of every request of the good people of my district promptly and effectively. My stand upon every piece of legislation coming before Congress is a matter of record and has not been attacked during this campaign. The way I have supported and worked for the ex-service men has never at any time been attacked, but has always been approved. My vote and my efforts in behalf of the farmer have been approved by every organization working in the interest of this great industry. Notwithstanding the fact that the Republican Party has been in control of our National Government, I have been a "thorn in the side" of the special interests who have sought to appropriate millions of dollars, which were unnecessary and which would have only benefited their own greedy few; and I am glad that I have been successful in preventing these appropriations which would not have benefited my people or the citizens of this Nation in any way.

The best way to size up an individual is to go to his home and consult his neighbors. This person lost his home box by over 3 to 1; in addition, lost his home county. He started out trying to poison the minds of every person against me. Then he dragged my wife into the campaign, because I kept her on the pay roll during the period I was in bad health, using the money to take care of extra employment. My, how he squalled until some of my friends happened to look into the State records and found that when he was superintendent of an Oklahoma State institution, his wife, notwithstanding there is a law against nepotism, was on the pay roll. How he did squirm! Then he got one of his appointees to make an affidavit that he had nothing to do with it. He set a steel trap for the other fellow and got caught in it himself. I heard about one of his former supporters, when he learned of his hypocrisy and demagogue tactics, he tore down his picture and threw his literature into the street. The records show that I have been unfortunate because I had to go to the hospital four times and undergo four operations. Everything I have done has been authorized by law, and I am proud that my friends resented the unjust, untrue attacks which were made upon me.

My very best efforts have always been given for those whom I have the honor to represent. Every public official in Washinton knows that the district has a high rating. The length of service or seniority is the determining factor that governs congressional matters. The constant support my constituents have given me has made it possible for the district to have a Member who is chairman of five groups. I have a service that is only exceeded by 35 out of the 435 Members of the House. I am secretary of the Democratic caucus and, in addition, the chairman of the Oklahoma House delegation. A new Member has to begin at the bottom and work up. The salary paid each Member is the same, yet every honor in the way of assignments would be lost to the district should there be a change. Therefore, I am hoping that those whom I have the honor to represent will pause long enough to make a comparison with the seventh district and other districts in our neighboring States. Texas has possibly three times as much power as any other State in the Union, because its citizens know about the rule of seniority and realize the longer a Member is retained the higher he will climb. On one occasion our Speaker of the House, the Hon. JOHN N. GARNER, had to undergo a similar campaign to that which is being made against me. A slanderer and loud-mouthed demagogue preached and poisoned the minds of some to the extent that a congressional committee went to Texas for the purpose of looking into the charges.

The people upheld their representative. The committee exonerated him. The House has since elected him Speaker, and at the last Democratic convention he was honored by being selected as the candidate for the Vice Presidency.

In addition, Texas probably has more chairmen of important committees than any other State, thus causing their districts to receive greater benefits than could be obtained by new men.

I have never served at the beginning of a Democratic administration. I honestly believe that my party will come into power next election. I have been personally acquainted with the Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, our candidate for the Presidency, ever since the year 1920, when I was chairman of the speakers' bureau for the Democratic National Committee and stationed at Chicago. At that time he was candidate for the Vice Presidency, and I feel that the Democratic Party should be congratulated for having selected such eminent, well-qualified men to head our ticket, and, of course, I feel that it would be advantageous to every citizen in the seventh congressional district to have in Congress one who has worked with them in the past.

My friends have made it possible for me to carry every county in the district by a large majority. I am proud of my home-town people, as I received 295 votes and my opponent only 26. A candidate that can not carry his home box or his home county surely can not expect other sections of the district to have any confidence in him. This result shows conclusively that an individual who tries to meet success by using the poisonous tongue of slander will never succeed, and I am proud of the fact that the vote shows that I had three friends in his home to his one.

During this campaign, up to the primary, I never called a single opponent by name. I have always tried to run on my own merits rather than the demerits of the other fellow, and I am sure that every good woman and every good man will resent the way that they tried to besmirch the name of my good wife, and I know that if they will put themselves in my place, that support will never be given to such an individual.

I want to make western Oklahoma a better place to live in. My highest aim in life is to help the deserving in the best manner possible; and regardless of how humble an individual may be, he knows from my record in the past that when he calls on me for aid that I will do my level best.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] such time as he may desire to use.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, to-day, throughout the land there is apparent confusion and distress. Many industries are at a standstill and almost everywhere we hear complaint of the unemployed.

All this occurs in a land where at the present there is more than enough produced to supply the needs of everyone. For this condition all kinds of explanations have been given.

The unscientific tariff law passed during the last Congress is blamed for the depression and certainly the tariff law did add to the trouble.

The unwise administration of our banking laws is pointed to as the cause of the country's troubles and no doubt it has been responsible for much disturbance in business.

The chief and controlling cause of the country's troubles is, however, a lack of readjustment among the factors of production in accordance with the true economic laws of distribution.

Almost the only thought and concern, however, of those in control of our affairs has been to make it possible to produce as much as possible as quickly and cheaply as possible. They have made practically no effort to require observance of the economic laws of distribution. They have, indeed, disregarded and violated the economic laws which determine the just share in what is produced that should be allotted to the three factors of production, namely, natural resources, labor, and capital. No attention has been given to this problem of distribution. On the contrary, those who have controlled the natural resources, those who have supplied the capital, and those who have performed the labor have exerted all their energies and influence to get for themselves the largest share possible of what all three, by their joint efforts, have produced.

In such a contest those who have controlled the natural resources have always been able to take from the joint product of labor, capital, and natural resources far more than has been justified by the conomic laws of distribution. Labor, and what is properly termed capital, have, therefore, received much less than their just share.

It is a self-evident fact that no kind of goods or commodities can be produced without the use of natural resources. Everything made of metal, for example, must originally come from the earth as ore. Everything made from wood must originally be derived from trees. The material of which clothes are made must be taken from plants such as cotton, which grows in the ground, or the cloth must be made from wool, fur, and so forth, which are taken from animals which feed from the earth. I repeat, therefore, that the material for everything used by the human race is derived from natural resources. It is perfectly clear, then, that in order to benefit from his ability to labor, man must have the opportunity to apply his labor to natural resources.

As already stated, however, the earth contains or produces absolutely all of the natural resources. If in any country the earth with its resources is controlled by private persons, then, for the privilege of applying their labor to the development of such resources, men must bargain with those who control the earth. That would be the only way in which a person with ability to labor could arrange to make a living.

It is clear, also, that the larger the number of persons who may be compelled to compete with each other for the same opportunity to supply to those in control of the natural resources the labor necessary to develop such resources—or, in other words, the larger the number who must seek for opportunity to work—then the less will those controlling the resources be compelled to pay to those who seek the opportunity to work for a living, and the less, also, will it be necessary for them to pay for the use of capital.

It is also as clear as the sunlight that as workmen, because of training or equipment, become able to produce more commodities in a certain length of time—or, in other words, as they become more efficient—then those in control of natural resources will employ fewer workmen. The result will be that some of the workmen will be discharged because they are no longer needed. The discharged men, of course, add to the army of unemployed, which thus grows larger and larger. Competition for opportunity to labor then becomes more intense and those who do procure employment are compelled to accept less and less for their services.

The productive power of workmen—that is, their efficiency—has in one way and another constantly increased since the beginning of our life as a nation.

It is important to remember, however, that it makes little difference how the efficiency of labor has been increased so long as the opportunity to use one's labor in productive processes is controlled by those who are in possession of the agencies of production. Under such circumstances, the more efficient the laborer becomes and the less time it requires to do his work, whether because of increased skill or because of the use of better tools, the more men will be turned out of employment by those in control of the agencies of production. If workmen are able to produce the same result in 10 per cent less time than was before required, then those in control of the agencies of production simply reduce the force of workmen 10 per cent. This fact answers the question so often asked by thinkers throughout history, "Why, with increased progress in the production of material things, do we have a corresponding increase in poverty?"

If while increasing the productive power or efficiency of labor we allow a few to monopolize the earth with its resources, then the lot of workmen will be almost hopeless. The more workmen may be able to produce in a certain length of time the smaller the number of workmen will the monopolizers require for their purpose. It would mean that every increase in the productive power of man would be appropriated or taken for the advantage of those controlling the agencies of production. Under such conditions, to refer to the increase in productive power as "progress" is wholly unwarranted. True progress requires the proper observance of the principles of justice in the distribution of what is produced by the joint action of natural resources—labor and capital.

The productive power of labor, i. e., its efficiency, has constantly increased since the beginning of our life as a nation. During that time the wealth of the country has become concentrated in fewer and fewer hands. The total wealth of our country to-day is more than six hundred and fifty times as much as it was at the time the Government was established. The proportionate share of the average person to-day, however, or, in other words, the percentage of the total wealth of the country which the average person owns to-day, is only one-fiftieth of the percentage owned by the average person when the United States Constitution was adopted.

The principal cause of the increase of the productive power of labor during our life as a Nation has been, of course, the development of machinery. The use of such machinery has made it possible for a few men to produce results that before required the efforts of many men. The question then naturally occurs to thoughtful persons: How, according to the principles of justice, should the benefits resulting from the use of machinery be distributed? Heretofore it has been taken for granted that whoever may have controlled the institutions utilizing such machinery had a right to appropriate for their own use the value of whatever work hours or days may have been saved as the result of the installation of machinery. Of course, that was and is a very unreasonable assumption. Carried to its logical conclusion it would mean that if machinery were devised which operated by 10 men would make it possible for them to produce all of the commodities and goods now produced by millions of people in the United States, and in the same time, the few people in control of the territory of the United States and the machinery could then order all of the other millions of people into the Atlantic or Pacific Ocean. This shows how ridiculous is the claim of those who say that the value of work hours saved by machinery should all and always go to those in control of the institutions employing the men who use the machinery.

In accordance with the economic laws of distribution the institution installing machinery that may save labor is entitled to the market rate of interest on the cost of such machinery installed. Ordinarily the deduction of such an amount from the total value of the hours of labor saved would reduce that total value very little—in fact, the reduction would hardly be appreciable. Now, when from the total amount saved in wages of labor the owner is allowed the interest on money paid for the machinery and a reasonable increase in the wages of management, would it not be just and fair that the employees' hours of labor should then be reduced in proportion to the total reduction in the amount of labor required to produce the same amount of goods as was produced before the installation of such machinery?

To illustrate, let us suppose that machinery were invented which would lessen the amount of labor heretofore required to produce hats. Let us assume that the machinery in question would reduce by 25 per cent the labor required to manufacture hats. For example, if before the use of the machinery in question 100,000 men were employed eight hours a day to manufacture the hats required to supply the yearly demand for hats by the American people, but with the use of machinery only 75,000 men were needed to make the same number of hats, then surely it would be fair that the hours of labor of each of the 100,000 men should be reduced substantially 25 per cent, or one-fourth. This reduction in the hours of labor would continue the employment of the 100,000 men originally required to manufacture the hats. The only difference would be that their hours of labor would be shorter by 25 per cent, or one-fourth, without any reduction in the daily compensation. It would be unjust to reduce the daily compensation of the hat makers, because the actual cost of producing the hats would not have increased, except to the trifling extent required to pay the interest on the cost of installing the new machinery by the industry and a reasonable increase in the wages of management.

This principle should, of course, be applied to every industry. This would in fact prevent unemployment, and it would do so with absolute justice to all concerned. The great thinkers and prophets of the past have foretold hopefully the increased happiness which they were sure would accompany the general increase in the intelligence of the human race. Most of them thought that so-called modern inventions could bring only blessings to the race, and they would do so if the economic laws of distribution were properly observed. As matters are now controlled, however, the more machinery is developed and used the more helpless becomes the great mass of our people.

To-day there are more than 10,000,000 people idle and unable to find employment at all. That means, of course, that they are unable to buy much, if anything, that is produced by industry. These 10,000,000 men, faced by want and haunted by the cries of their wives and children, who are suffering, enter into a mad competition for employment with those who are already employed. This means a constant reduction of the wages of those who are fortunate enough to remain employed and a consequent decrease in their purchasing power.

If we provide for the reduction of the workmen's hours and days of labor in proportion to the reduction of time resulting from the use of machinery, everyone will continue to be employed, if he so desires. If we fail to adopt a remedy of this kind, the present civilization is as sure to be destroyed as were the great civilizations of the past.

Pliny said, "Rome fell because of her great estates." He was discussing the fatal results of disregarding the principles of economic justice.

It is pathetic to observe that some of those who belong to the employing class, even in a very trifling way, regard as objectionable a remedy such as we have suggested, or indeed any other that is calculated to improve the condition of the employee class. I say that it is pathetic—yes; tragic—that an employer should oppose remedies of the kind here suggested. If the army of unemployed continues to increase—as certainly will be the case if we continue to increase the use of machinery without making the adjustment I have suggested—then the market for the products of such industries as still succeed in continuing in business for a while will continue to be more and more restricted, and that means less business and more concerns out of business.

We can not cause or tolerate the unemployment of millions of men without also putting out of business those who were the employers of those men. Sound principles of trade or commerce in any country and in all countries require that everyone be assured the full value of his service, whether he be in a position requiring the use of overalls or in the position of manager directing the business. Unless the full reward for service is assured to everyone, we begin to find that people in general do not receive enough compensation to be good buyers.

As is always the case, of course, absolute justice is best for everyone in the long run. It is of interest also to remember that with the assurance of receiving the benefit of his increased efficiency, because of the use of machinery or otherwise, the employee would naturally endeavor to increase still further his efficiency and skill. He would know that it would mean more time for himself in the long run.

I supported the measure providing $2,100,000,000 for unemployment relief when it came before the House. Under the present circumstances I regard the measure as necessary, for I know how long it requires to bring about a fundamental change such as I have discussed, and we can not allow people to suffer while we are waiting for changes of such a fundamental nature. Let us make no mistake about it, however; the passage of unemployment-relief measures will not solve the problem of unemployment. They give temporary relief, and that is all.

More than two years ago I warned of the increase of unemployment to an extent heretofore undreamed of. I then proposed the remedy which I have discussed, and I hope that before it is too late the principle will be adopted.

During this session of Congress I introduced a joint resolution, No. 384, which proposed to amend the Constitution of the United States by adopting the following language:

ART. 22. To promote the general welfare, the Congress shall have the power to reduce the number of hours of service per day and days per week for which contracts of employment may lawfully be made.

The adoption of such an amendment is absolutely necessary for any scientific reduction in the hours of labor. Even if the States had power to reduce the hours of labor, it would neither be fair nor effective for them to do so. One State more enlightened than another, for example, might provide for a comparatively short working day, while other States might refuse to do so. This would place a penalty on employers in the more enlightened State which had ordered a reduction of hours, and would make it impossible for employers in such State to sell their goods in competition with the rest of the country.

If, on the other hand, we depend on the voluntary action of employers throughout the country, the results would be most unsatisfactory. Moreover, the larger the number of unemployed in the country the less hope there would be for any general voluntary reduction in the hours of labor. If the amendment I have suggested were adopted, Congress could provide for a body like the Interstate Commerce Commission, which would remain constantly in session. Applications for reduction in hours of labor in any industry would be filed with the commission whenever the facts might seem to warrant such action. The commission would then conduct hearings and receive testimony to determine whether or not any increase in the efficiency of labor may have resulted because of the use of improved machinery or otherwise; and if it should find that such increase in efficiency had occurred, then it would be the duty of the commission to reduce the hours of labor for that industry in proportion to the increase in the efficiency of labor.

In conclusion let me repeat that if we would assure the future welfare of our country we must apply some fundamental remedy such as I have discussed. No halfway measures will be sufficient.

In urging the application of the remedy which has been discussed we have in mind the best interests of the pepole as a whole, regardless of classes or groups. It is highly important to the employee class, of course, but it is equally important to the employer class and to the merchant, the farmer, the professional man, and all others.

Let us do our part in a practical way to lessen the distress and fear of want now suffered by men, women, and children throughout the land. Let us do our best to establish economic justice and a sound social order. [Applause.]

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman withhold that for just a moment? The committee is going to rise in a moment.

Mr. BACHMANN. I withhold it for the present.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an interview with the majority leader of the House on the tariff and other questions printed in Collier's.

Mr. BRITTEN. I object, Mr. Chairman. I understand it is a magazine article.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the article referred to by the gentleman is one written by the distinguished majority leader of the House [Mr. RAINEY], and I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what does that article do? Does it denounce the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is an interview with the majority leader on the tariff and other questions.

Mr. SCHAFER. Denouncing the protective tariff, which has not been changed one iota by the Democratic majority in this House?

Mr. PATTERSON. I will explain the article to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. Until I see the article, I shall object. If it is a lot of talk and demagoguery about the tariff, with no action taken, I will have to object. I object for the present, until I have a chance to read the article.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the messages of the President, had come to no resolution thereon.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE—COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

In compliance with paragraph 5, section 2, of the Army appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, I transmit herewith the sixteenth annual report of the Council of National Defense for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1932.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 8, 1932.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MILLER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES M. BECK, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Representative JAMES M. BECK at a dinner in his honor in London, June 21, 1932:

Lord Reading, ladies and gentlemen of the English-Speaking Union, I find it difficult in words to express my great appreciation of the honor that the English-Speaking Union has again done me in making me its guest on this occasion. It is, of course, an added pleasure that my friend of many years, Lord Reading, has been good enough to take the chair, and if anything could add to the pleasure it gives me, it is the gracious words of introduction in which he has been pleased to speak so pleasantly and generously of me. I can only say, as I think Olivia says in Twelfth Night, "Thanks, and again thanks, and ever thanks."

It was my great privilege to be present at the dinner which welcomed Lord Reading when he returned as viceroy from India. I have attended many great public banquets in London in the last 25 years and I never attended any in which there was such a brilliant assembly of distinguished Englishmen of all parties as on that occasion, and I have rarely heard such a spontaneous expression of admiration and affection for a man as was then voiced by that great audience. But the one thing that stands out in my recollection of that dinner was the modest, unspoiled figure of the guest of the evening, and it made such an impression upon me, because, while he did not emphasize it, we were all conscious of a fact, so dear to the American heart, of honoring one who, starting with little, had yet achieved the very highest honors of the Empire, and was now, on his return to London, being received, without reference to party divisions, with an enthusiasm which, as I have said, I have rarely heard equaled.

Lord Reading has evoked the great memories of war days. For myself, they are very glorious memories. No disillusion has ever changed them. If it was a baptism of blood, it was likewise a baptism of the spirit, and in these days of disillusion and depression one almost wishes again to have—not the war but that magnificent spirit that placed fidelity to duty even unto death above any possible selfish interest. What four years they were! And who that lived through them can ever forget them?

For, after all, when the youth of England and other nations went forth in that Great War and showed that fidelity unto death of which I have spoken, they approached the Master most nearly, for how can man more nearly approach the spiritual leader of our western christendom than in laying down his life for his fellow men and for an ideal?

I have chosen a subject to-day of extraordinary delicacy. It was suggested to me that I ought—not as a member of the executive branch of the Government, for, as Lord Reading has said, I am none, but as a modest Member of the House of Representatives, and therefore of the American Congress, which, in the last analysis, determines the policies of the Nation—to say something in respect of this vexed question of debts. I shall not predict what will be the solution of the problem. I am not a prophet. I am not even going to venture to suggest what would be my own policy. I may say, however, quoting an historic epigram very familiar in American politics, of President Cleveland, that it is "a condition and not a theory that confronts us," and that condition is the widespread wreckage of our western civilization, almost approaching to that "twilight of the gods" known in Norse mythology.

I sometimes think that 68 years from now a historian of that time may imitate Gibbon by trying to write the first 2,000 years of history since the birth of Christ, and if he essays such a stupendous task I am not sure that he will not say that the four major crises of this 2,000 years were: First, the downfall of the Roman Empire, which required 10 centuries for Europe to recover; secondly, the prodigious aftermath of the so-called Reformation, culminating in the Thirty-Years War, which so desolated Europe that it took another century for it to recover from that cataclysmic disaster; thirdly, the Napoleonic wars, when the insensate ambition of a stupendous military leader deluged Europe with blood until, as Victor Hugo said, he was led from the Battle of Waterloo "the mighty somnambulist of a shattered dream of universal empire"; and the last, the World War, with its aftermath, which seems to me, in the present wreckage of the whole world, to be the fourth major catastrophe of the last 2,000 years.

Now, that is the condition that confronts us, and it is a condition that must be met by all nations. But in discussing this question of debts it seems very important to distinguish between what have been called the ponderables and the imponderables. There is a ponderable, namely, that in the present condition of society something must be done to lift the world out of the rut of depression, and every nation, without respect to the peculiar nature of its rights or obligations, must contribute to that end.

But there is, and it should never be forgotten, a great imponderable to the question and that is the sanctity of credit between nations. If we were to say, as I understand is suggested in Lausanne, that, without respect to the possibilities of the future and the reconstruction of civilization, all debts should be sponged out entirely, then, considering only the ponderables, a great weight would be lifted off of civilization for the time being and the process of economic reconstruction would begin afresh; but, alas, there would be the imponderable, that for generations to come men would say, "What faith can we give to the credit of nations when they make a promise, which they do not say they will carry out when convenient but that they will sponge out?" not even with the grace of Micawber, who was so far sensible of an obligation that he, at least, gave a promissory note, and then thanked God that that debt was paid! The proposition is not to give a promissory note but simply to say, "Let us forget all debts; let us start afresh." I shall not refer to the ponderable that there is a very substantial burden of the war upon the taxpayers of my own country. I am only calling your attention to this great imponderable which, if we are to consider the future, we must take into account—that if 10 years from now another war should come, and if then America should be the money market of the world, and again the Allies, defending the basic principles of liberty, should go to America and say, "Lend us money," it would be recalled that when such loans were last made the debts were expunged wholly without respect to the possibilities of the future. Now, that view of it I am not going to discuss except to the extent that I have briefly indicated.

I want rather to say that, inasmuch as it is the condition and not the theory of obligation which confronts us, it does demand immediate reconstructive remedies, in which creditor and debtor must participate; and England has the double capacity, for she is creditor and debtor and she has been generous in being willing to forget her obligations as creditor as well as asking consideration for her position as debtor; because no one can question the high-minded position that England has taken in this matter, but in solving this problem, in determining what can be done, the real difficulty, so far as my country is concerned, is one of psychology, and by psychology I mean the confused psychology of multiplied personality.

I am sure that not even the press table knows what I mean by that. Even Lord Reading here, with the sagacity of a great lawyer, former Lord Chief Justice of England, I know I have him guessing as to what I mean by "the confused psychology of multiplied personality." I am going to tell you what I mean, because it goes to the heart of what I want to say, as a contribution to that good understanding between our peoples, which it has always been your aim, Lord Reading, and I venture to say my aim, to promote.

What I mean by this confused psychology is illustrated by what Oliver Wendell Holmes said in The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. The great autocrat found two young men at the table named John and Ben engaged in a controversy. Their minds were not exactly at one.

Thereupon the autocrat said that was not surprising because, as a matter of fact, when John and Ben got into a discussion six people were talking, and it was quite natural, if six people got talking simultaneously, there would be some confusion and some inability to reach a common conclusion. And when the genial autocrat was asked to explain, this was his explanation. He said, in the first place, there was John's idea of John—not necessarily the true John; then there was Ben's idea of John, which was not the true John; then there was God's idea of John, which was different from either. Then there was Ben's idea of Ben, there was John's idea of Ben, and there was God's idea of Ben. So that there were six personalities, two of them being real and only known to their common Maker, the other four personalities were each of them, to a certain extent, fictitious, and yet they talked as though they were actual personalities.

Now I want to apply that in respect of these debts. It is a very delicate question. I wish I could have prepared the address. I am speaking quite extemporaneously. I prefer to do that, because in such an address one has not time to be politic. I am not like a Member of the House of Representatives who, in the last session, sent up a trial balloon speech on the floor of the House in order to see how it would please his constituents. It displeased them mightily, and he hastily left Washington and hurried to his constituency and made a speech precisely the opposite of what he had said in the House of Representatives.

He thought that would not attract attention in Washington, but it did, and when he returned to the House one of the Members said he had understood the honorable Member for so-and-so had made a speech to such-and-such an effect in the House and that he had gone then to his own home and made a precisely opposite speech, and would the honorable Member be kind enough to explain how he could say two entirely opposite things? Of course, there was a hush in the House, and then this Member rose and said, "I want to tell the honorable gentleman who makes the inquiry that there are times in the life of every statesman when he must rise above principle." [Laughter.]

I am not going to rise above principle to-day. I am going to say to you exactly what I would say to my own countrymen at home; in fact I may say it is precisely what I have done on the occasion of any address I was ever privileged to make to a London audience, and therefore I may be wholly wrong; I may misjudge the situation; I may not be as helpful in producing better feeling as I am trying to be; but you will hear me for my cause, and I know you will censure me in your wisdom.

I shall not venture to say what is England's idea of England in the matter of these debts, although I think I could make a fairly shrewd guess. You say you entered the war, you staked your Empire with a glory and a heroism of self-sacrifice that will challenge the admiration of the ages, for a principle in the matter of the invasion of Belgium. You gave 800,000 of the lives of your sons upon the battlefields of Flanders and, indeed, the battlefields of the whole world-wide war, for wherever there was a battle one could almost say there were English soldiers fighting, with a courage and a heroism that surpasses words to describe. You will say, "In our desperation, when we were fighting the battles of civilization, we borrowed money from you. We agreed to pay it, and then we were confronted with an unprecedented catastrophe of world-wide dimensions," which, as I have said, really constitutes one of the four major catastrophes of the last 2,000 years. You will say, therefore, that America ought, without a word, or without waiting for England to ask, without involving any sacrifice to England's pride, she ought to say, "We were your allies in the war; we will wipe out the debts of our debtor and give the world the chance to pull through." That fairly describes England's idea of England in the matter.

Now, let us come—and this is the main point—to America's idea of America in this debt controversy.

Prior to the year 1914 the United States was on the eve of reaching a unique position among nations. Its national debt was so small—a little less than $2,000,000,000—and the annual surplus of our revenue was so great just prior to the World War that it was probable, and almost certain, that in a few years this Nation, one of the master States of the world, would be without any national debt whatever. The World War came. We knew nothing about the quarrels in the Balkans, and we cared less. We knew nothing and had little practical concern in the affairs of Europe. We were no part of the nice division of power between the Entente on the one hand and the Central Powers on the other. European politics were as remote from us as would have been an internecine war in Mars itself. However, we did take, some of us, an intensely deep interest in the flagrant affront to the bases of civilization involved not only in the invasion of Belgium but in denying to Serbia, whatever her merits may be, the day in court for which she asked and for which the Foreign Minister of England so wisely urged; and let me say that no more striking illustration of the wisdom and the justice of your Sir Edward Grey could be found than the Memoirs of Prince von Bulow. He says, speaking as a former chancellor of the Empire, that if Germany had accepted Sir Edward Grey's pacific proposals there would not have been a World War, at least at that time.

Then the sparks began to fly in our direction, chiefly falling upon our ships on the high seas. We then went into the war, to make a long story short. In an incredibly short time we improvised an army of 3,000,000 men and with the aid of the British Navy we sent 2,000,000 to France, a colossal achievement. But we did more. We lent money by the billions to help in the cause, taking all the hazard of the conflict.

I remember that when Lord Reading came to America before we were in the war, at a time when I think he will admit that the treasury of the British Empire was pretty close to exhaustion, the bankers of New York were so swayed by his eloquence that Lord Reading came back with five hundred millions. That was before we went into the war. By the way, in getting that loan, let me say that the charm of Lord Reading's presence and the abiding influence of his personality has never faded from the memory of America.

We went into the war and when the war was ended this Nation, which was on the eve of having no national debt, had amassed a national debt of twenty-six billions of dollars as our contribution.

Moreover, when that war ended and peace came, America said—now this is all important in view of what I am going to say—America said, "We do not want anything." We could have had our share of the reasonable spoils of the victory that were in part to repair the infinite damage that Germany had done. We said, "No; we went into this war for an ideal, because we believed the Allies were right, because our shipping was also incidentally affected and the rights of our citizens traveling on the high seas menaced, but we want nothing out of it." Was that all? No. Europe was then in such a state of wreckage that it might have been possible for the Bolshevism of Russia to have swept over Europe like the shadow of a huge eclipse, and in that case the Dark Ages might have returned for Europe just as they came to Europe after the fall of the Roman Empire. No man can ever conceive of the possibility that was in the situation immediately after the war closed; and we then gave hundreds of millions to relieve the suffering, the starving, the dying in Russia, Germany, everywhere, wherever there was a human being we could help, anything we could do to help the world, we did it, and gave.

Nevertheless, there was a feeling which said: "Well, we have made this sacrifice, we have rolled up our debt from two to twenty-six billions. We have given money to Germany and Austria to help them get on their feet and pay these reparations. But, after all, why not forget them?" And then—I do not know who it was, but one of your publicists came out with a statement that called us "Uncle Shylock," and the expression was echoed in other nations, and that sunk like iron in our very souls. Make no mistake about it. I speak with a certain amount of emotion. I did not wish to do so, but when you think of the sacrifices that America has made—I think I can say this without undue patriotic self-complacency—when you think of the generous attitude that America has shown—then to be called "Shylock," to be told that we were whetting our knife and saying "We want our pound of flesh, and we care nothing for the rest of the world or for its interests"—that shocked us.

What was our attitude toward these debts? At the very beginning, not merely the unofficial word of America but its official word as expressed by acts of Congress which are the final statement of the policy of the American people, said, "We do not want any debtor to pay one penny more than his capacity to pay," and we followed that up by a thing that I had forgotten, but which a good friend of Anglo-American relations, Mr. Arthur H. Pollen, quoted from the act of 1922, which created the debt commission, and if America had nothing more to its credit than this, it is to its infinite credit.

Now in reading this, please remember we were not the prosperous Nation that we became a few years later. At the time this was written we were in a depression, not so great as the depression now prevailing, but there were from four to six millions out of work in 1921, and yet the act of Congress, in setting up the United States Debt Commission, not only said it wanted no debtor to pay beyond its capacity, but the act said that the debtor nation must be permitted "to preserve and improve its economic position; to bring its budget into balance, and to place its finances and currency on a sound basis, and to maintain, and if possible improve, the standard of living of its citizens. No settlement which is oppressive and retards the recovery and development of the foreign debtor is to the best interests of the United States or of Europe."

Was there ever a more generous statement of policy than that? We were concerned not merely with your budgetary difficulties, but even with the standard of living.

Very well. Now England came, to its credit it did not wait. The other nations—we did not ask anyone to come in the sense of a mandate of any creditor; we waited for them to do what they thought they could. England came, sent its Chancellor of the Exchequer and the governor of the Bank of England, and England said, "England never defaults on its obligations. We owe $4,600,000,000. We can not pay it now. Give us a reasonable number of years and we will pay it."

Undoubtedly neither Mr. Baldwin nor Mr. Norman nor the United States ever conceived as a possibility the depression that was to befall the whole world, including England and the United States; and if there be one feeling in America on the debt question—I am saying this advisedly, I am not speaking simply as a mere citizen but as one of the legislative branch of the American Government—if there is one feeling that rises above every other feeling in the debt question in America it is sympathy with England. We admire the fact that she said, "England does not default in its obligations."

You may say that the interest charged was large. That is recognized now, but please remember that the interest charged was based on the interest charge with which the United States borrowed the money to make these colossal loans from its own citizens.

Therefore, under these circumstances there was that statement; that is still the attitude of the United States; that we do not want any nation to pay us anything beyond its capacity; and, of course, so far as its present capacity, we must rely on what foreign nations tell us with respect to that capacity.

What have we done in the matter of France and Italy and the rest? They did not follow closely upon England's footsteps. They waited three and four years, as I recall, and when they came they made a settlement with us in which, if you analyze it, there was not one penny paid to us for that portion of the twenty-six billions that we loaned during the progress of the war. The only thing that France and Italy—I do not know what happens as to Belgium—ever agreed to pay us was that which was contributed after the armistice.

Our consistent attitude, then and now, is that we want you to tell us what you feel you can do consistently with those great ideals of which I spoke, the maintenance of your currency, the preservation of your budget, and, above all, the standard of life of your citizens, and what you can pay which is consistent with the credit of nations, if credit is ever to be maintained, whether it be now or 10 years or 25 years from now—that that obligation shall be honored.

Now, but you will say, when the moratorium was ratified by Congress, did not Congress add the proviso that they would not grant another moratorium?

That is true. Many of us regret it. But why was it? Let me remind you of that. The situation demanded a moratorium. Congress was not in session. President Hoover had no constitutional power to grant the moratorium; thereupon he did the extraconstitutional thing, although it was wise and just; he telegraphed to every Member of Congress and asked their consent in that informal and extraconstitutional manner. To show the spirit of the American people, three-fourths of the Congress, without getting together, without any debate, said to the President, "Very well. We will back you up." And, without respect of party, they did. But when the ratification of that moratorium came before Congress in December, then the question with Congress was whether the precedent, which was without precedent in American history, of the President doing that which Congress alone had legal competence to do, might, if nothing was said, happen again; and, therefore, some Members of the House insisted on adding the provision that the ratification of that extraconstitutional act must not be regarded as a precedent.

It is true—I want to be perfectly candid—that at that time there was the feeling growing out of the searing of our very souls by the Uncle Shylock statement and by the repetition of it all over the world, and there were many of us—I do not mean I was one of them—but there were many of us who felt that if after all we had tried to do and what we felt had been a generous attitude we were to be stigmatized as a harsh, unfeeling, and oppressive creditor that there was no occasion for us to indulge in any more sentiment. Besides that there was the other consideration that impressed the House of Representatives, and that was that in America there is a great deal of feeling in the South and West and to some extent in the Middle West against the international bankers, meaning the bankers of New York City, and as American investors had lost literally billions by the immense loans that the international bankers had made abroad the feeling was prevalent in Congress, and had a great deal of influence, that the international bankers wanted to wipe out the governmental debts altogether in order to get back their private advances; and Wall Street bankers are not so popular in Washington that the argument did not have a deleterious effect.

My friends of the English-Speaking Union, I do not know whether you have altogether liked what I have said. Perhaps, like Mr. Guppy, when he made his declaration of marriage and told his inamorata that she must understand that his proposal of marriage was strictly "without prejudice," perhaps I ought to say—but, no. There is no "without prejudice" with me. I stand or fall upon the truth that I have said. I do not suggest for one moment that we are a saint, or that wings are sprouting from the shoulders of Uncle Sam, or that we are about to ascend to heaven in a triumphal atmosphere of undiluted purity. We are very human. As I said, we are a conglomerate of many sections and classes with marked economic differences and at the present hour I know very well we are suffering from the worst panic we ever had. We did have a temporary period of prosperity and it was a prosperity largely built upon speculation and hopes and gambling; but the fact is that the World War dragged us down into ruin, as it did the Allies. We are also in the abyss. There are to-day—if I can trust to the Washington despatch to the London Times, I think it was—from eight to ten millions of people out of work in America.

Private fortunes have shrunk to a tenth of what they once were, with very few exceptions. There has never been for a century such a debacle as in America to-day, and the chief contributing cause of that debacle is the inflation of the war, when we multiplied our farms and our factories far beyond any possible use of the future, plus the fact that we gave to the cause of the Allies at least one-tenth of the vast wealth of the United States. Practically $30,000,000,000 was our contribution to that common cause.

I am drawing very near to a conclusion. Of course something has to be done about these debts. There is no use striving to balance relative equities. The idea I want to put into your heads—and I wish I had the whole British Cabinet here to-day—is that if you want America to contribute you will not gain her cooperation by abusing America. The more you call us "Uncle Shylock" and accuse us of being unfeeling, of having no heart, of being sublimely selfish, you harden our heart. The way to approach America is to appeal to that which is just as much a part of our soul as it is of the English soul—generosity, magnanimity. You appeal to that and you will not appeal in vain.

I take again the proof of it in that statement of the act creating the Debt Commission, when we were so far concerned with the loftiest considerations of unselfishness and magnanimity that we did not say in the debt statement, "There must be a settlement that will protect the standard of life of America," or "That will keep our Budget in balance," or "That will keep our currency from depreciating." What we said to the whole world, as I have quoted, is, "We want nothing from you that will in any way interfere with your internal prosperity and well-being, and upon that basis come and tell us what you think you can reasonably do and we will accept it."

Now, this has a very intimate relation with the whole question of Anglo-American relations. Is it possible that we, who fought side by side, our ships side by side, our men in the trenches side by side, is it possible that we can sacrifice that blood comradeship of arms, the most sacred and holy of all ties, which has created the greatest thing of modern history, namely, the solidarity of the English-speaking races; are we going to sacrifice that to a wretched question of pounds and shillings or of dollars and cents? I am sure the good sense of both countries will not permit it.

As long as England's idea of England is not too warped, and as long as America's idea of America is not too warped—above England and America is the Supreme Justice of Nations, and England and America should forget themselves in their attitude and point of view and try to look at the inherent nature of the problem as it is established by the standards of eternal justice, and, what is more than eternal justice, eternal compassion. If we do that, there will be no lasting difference between us.

We might feel a little harsh against some of our other debtor nations, because I think there is a feeling in America that they have not played the game, but I assure you that as far as I am capable of judging public opinion in my country, there is no suggestion among any thoughful men in America that England has not nobly played the game to the best of its capacity.

And so let us pass this dreary subject, with which I have afflicted you, with, I hope, some contribution to the subject. Let me then simply quote, as an expression of my faith and confidence, words I had thought were by Wordsworth; but, I spent yesterday morning in the Athenæum Library and could not find them and possibly they are by the poet laureate Watson. I can not even quote them exactly, but I can quote with sufficient accuracy to round out my speech with the sentiment and the feeling which I would leave with you as my modest contribution to the occasion. The words are somewhat like this:

O ye who on eastern and western land,
O ye who native to noble sounds speak truth for truth,
Speak in creative youth
The universal language,
And do live its breathing book,
Live worthy of that great, heroic heritage.
Parted, yet a whole,
Far and yet unsevered,
And ye shall be lords of an empire,
Sublime as Milton's speech, immemorial speech,
And fair as Shakespeare's dream.

THE TARIFF AND "MOST-FAVORED-NATION" TREATIES

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request I made a while ago to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an interview on the tariff and reciprocity by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] having withdrawn his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I herewith print an interview of Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, majority floor leader of the House of Representatives, with John T. Flynn, which appeared in Collier's for May 21, 1932.

The interview is as follows:

THE TRAP THAT JACK BUILT

By John T. Flynn

(What will the Democrats do about the tariff if they come into power next fall? The answer comes from HENRY T. RAINEY, majority floor leader and tariff expert. If you think that "most-favored nation" is an agreeable social phrase, he's here to disillusion you. The trap we're in and the way to get out are his subjects.)

For the first time in our history America finds herself on the outside of tariff walls looking in, instead of inside looking out and laughing at the world. The world has risen in arms against us—the land of protection—and the weapons with which she is arming are our own—tariffs (plus some of her own forging), quotas, embargoes, controls, licenses, and other instruments of offense. We are face to face with a war—a tariff war—and we started it. It has already cost us billions. It will cost us many more billions before we are out of it. It already involves the daily wages of a million men.

"How to get out of it is the almost supreme problem which calls for our attention now. For many decades we have had our inevitable tariff argument every few years. We talked and jabbered and took a few bricks off or, more likely, put a few more bricks on our famous tariff wall. Now the old tariff argument is with us again. But this time it is a brand-new subject. It is no longer just a tariff question. It is a question of the very existence of our foreign trade. The tariff is now merely a part of this subject. As I see it, the matter may be stated briefly thus:

"1. Every important trading nation in the world has built and is strengthening a tariff wall around itself to keep us out.

"2. Great Britain is just launching a grand design to organize the world against us by creating a vast group of nations with low tariffs for one another and a high tariff wall for us—a world into which we can not penetrate with our goods.

"3. Our only hope of relief would be in a broad, generous policy of reciprocity. But this is utterly impossible because our high-tariff people, through our State Department, have sewed us up with a series of 45 treaties and agreements which make reciprocity impossible.

"4. Sixteen nations, led by Great Britain, have abandoned the gold standard. This results in lowering our own tariff barriers to these nations, at the same time increasing theirs to us.

"5. As a result of this we will see a determined effort to build still higher our own tariff walls, making relief all the more impossible.

OUR VANISHING FOREIGN TRADE

"We are in a tariff trap. High-tariff beneficiaries are already organizing in Washington for still higher tariffs. Low-tariff believers are crying for lower rates. But neither group is thinking about the real problem. The real problem is to get back our foreign trade. What we need now is a plan—a broad, comprehensive plan to save that foreign trade from complete disaster. Our tariff policy will be only part of that plan."

These ominous words came to me from the snowy-locked Democratic leader of the House, HENRY T. RAINEY. I talked with RAINEY because I knew that in business everybody is wondering what the Democrats will do about the tariff if they get into power next fall. Political conventions promulgate promises about the tariff. But the tariff policy of any party is always made in one place—the House of Representatives.

RAINEY is not only the Democratic floor leader but he is the veteran of more tariff battles than any other man in the House. He is certainly the leading student of that vexatious subject on his side of Congress. There are Members in the House who don't know any more about the tariff than they learn from the walking delegate of their own home-town chamber of commerce. They wouldn't know a tariff schedule from a bootlegger's price list. Not RAINEY. RAINEY works at the tariff. And like the grounds keeper at the ball park who goes out and helps with the work on his day off, RAINEY likes to rest up from his tariff labors by laboring a little more on the tariff. He goes in for tariffs instead of golf or bridge. And when the Democrats come to make a tariff policy RAINEY's voice will be powerful.

THE TERROR OF TARIFF MAKERS

A stranger to Congress might be a little leery of RAINEY. In appearance and bearing he has all the marks of one of those old Gladstonian liberals. He has a massive mane of white hair and a distinguished bearing. He is soft-spoken and amiable in manner. He is 71, and looks a bit like a sage—the "Sage of Walnut Hall," reporters sometimes call him. This is in allusion to his fine old home at Carrollton, in southern Illinois. Walnut Hall is a fine modern dairy farm. But it is also one of those modest estates which a man of moderate means but with education and taste can create out of his own devoted interest in it.

It is filled with lovely trees and flowers, a couple of swimming pools, some deer, and bits of classic statuary which RAINEY has picked up here and there. All this is thrown open to the people and children of his town as a park and picnic grounds where they may feel at home. This again confirms the suggestion of the Victorian liberal—half philosopher and half landed proprietor. But there the resemblance ends. RAINEY is far enough advanced in his liberalism to be able to say, for instance: "The trouble with a lot of Democrats is that they don't know Thomas Jefferson is dead." He spent last summer in Russia and he has become the most active exponent in the House of our resuming relations with that country and learning some lesson from what he calls their "intelligent planning."

He really started the famous tariff revolt of 1908 which flowered into the Wilson election of 1912. He charged in a famous speech that American manufacturers, protected by a tariff at home, were selling abroad cheaper than they were selling in America. Then he produced an American watch, which he had bought imported from abroad cheaper than its sale price in America, to prove it. Before he got through, like a magician he proceeded to produce 40 different watches bought in the same way.

That speech set things in motion. The Democrats circulated 11,000,000 copies of it. After Wilson's election RAINEY proposed and forced the passage of the Tariff Commission. Now he is Democratic floor leader. But for a break in his service for one term he would have been the ranking Democrat and in GARNER'S place as Speaker.

Like SNELL, the Republican leader whom he opposes daily, he is a graduate of Amherst. He is not merely a college man, but a man of education who has studied as well as practiced the history and philosophy of government. And as to his mild manner and amiable appearance, in debate he wields a saber and not a poniard. He has been a thorn in the side of the Republicans.

Now he has made a new conception of our tariff problem which will, beyond doubt, have a powerful if not controlling influence on the tariff course of the Democrats if they can ride into power.

"It is popular now to make light of our foreign trade," he said. I talked with him in his office just off the floor of the House during some very exciting days recently when Members were running in every few minutes for hurried conferences. It took several days, in fact, to get through my talk with him, and I marveled at the perfect fireside complacence with which he submitted to incessant interruptions and then went on quietly smoking his pipe and chatting with me as calmly as if we were sitting in his flower garden.

"People tell us our foreign trade is just 7 or 8 per cent of all our trade," he continued. "But four years ago in our political campaign we didn't make light of it. Mr. Hoover told us then that 'our total volume of exports translates itself into employment for 2,400,000 families, while its increase in the last seven years has interpreted itself into a livelihood for an additional 500,000 families.'

"In 1929, we sold abroad $5,251,000,000 in merchandise. Last year we sold less than half of that. In January and February of this year it was about one-third less than it was in the same months last year; about two-thirds less than it was in those months of 1929. As a matter of fact, practically all the increase in our foreign trade, laboriously built up during the last 20 years, has been wiped out. If Mr. Hoover's estimate is correct, the livelihood of over a million families in this country has been destroyed by the losses in our foreign trade in the last year. It will be worse this year.

BUSINESS THAT WON'T COME BACK

"The loss has been not merely in Europe. In South America in 1929 we sold $530,000,000 worth of goods. Last year we sold only $155,000,000.

"This is a very serious matter. Many people suppose that we have merely to wait for prosperity to drift back to us and that our foreign trade will return. They are mistaken. Our foreign trade is being systematically and definitely taken away from us and we will never get it back until we form a definite plan to recover it.

"It is very difficult to make people grasp the fact that you can not sell goods abroad unless you buy goods abroad, too. But this is a fact of the greatest importance. There is no international currency. The goods we buy abroad must be paid for with other goods. The only other way to pay for them is with gold. This, of course, is impossible, because there is not enough gold to pay for even a fraction of these purchases. Even the great, rich United States has not enough gold to pay for what it buys from foreign nations.

"Last year Great Britain bought $4,000,000,000 worth of goods. England has but $500,000,000 of gold. If she paid out the last grain of gold, it would settle for only six weeks' purchases. England couldn't afford to pay for a week's purchases with gold. She couldn't afford to lose that much. Obviously she must pay with something else or she can not buy. She must pay with goods or services. It must be perfectly plain, therefore, that if we will not buy abroad, we can not sell abroad. Yet that is exactly what we have been trying to do.

"For years we lived in a fools' paradise. We had our tariff walls; our chief buyers had none. We sold what we wished abroad. We permitted no one to send us anything save what we actually needed. We were young; we needed much, and so trade moved in both directions.

"But we developed fast. We shut out first one commodity and then another. Then came the war, and soon we found ourselves selling very much and buying much less. After the war, with the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill, we attempted to close our ports to the trade of the world as completely as possible. Of course, we could hardly expect to do business with the rest of the world on this basis. We could not sell to people who were not permitted to pay with the only thing they had to pay with—their goods.

RIGHT BACK WHERE WE STARTED

"Yet we did do business with them. We sold them each year from half a billion to a billion dollars' worth of goods more than we bought from them. How were they able to pay for these goods? They were not. We simply loaned them the money. Our producers each year sold them millions of dollars in goods. Our bankers loaned them millions of dollars to pay for the goods. They still owe the loans. Who knows whether or not they will ever be paid? At any rate, we can lend them no more. Their credit is broken.

"And hence we must come back where we started from—we must let them pay in goods not only for the goods they now buy but for the loans they now owe. We must do that or we must just end trading with them altogether. We must throw our billions of loans into the scrap heap and we must throw our $5,000,000,000 export trade along with them. We have been fooling ourselves. But we are now in one of those spots of merciless realism where we can fool ourselves no longer.

"This, in fact, was our situation in 1930, though we refused to see it. Instead of dealing with it we passed another tariff bill—the present Hawley-Smoot bill—the highest in the history of protective tariffs. It is the only tariff bill in our history which was passed without a public demand. When it was being debated, 30 foreign nations protested, many warned us that they would have to take measures against us if it were passed. Of course, we sneered at that—the great United States would make its own tariff rates without consulting any other nation on earth.

"But as soon as the Hawley-Smoot bill was passed these countries began to make good their threats. They proceeded to build their own tariff walls. The chief point in these foreign tariffs is that they are mainly directed at the United States. They are retaliatory tariffs. They are made expressly to keep our goods out.

"Take South America, where our trade losses have been greatest. Mexico got four-fifths of her wheat from us. She has taxed that 30 per cent. She has increased her tariff on lard 100 per cent, on eggs 20 per cent, on peas 50 per cent, on corn 500 per cent. These must be aimed at us, because it is from us she has bought the bulk of these goods.

A WORLD OUT FOR REVENGE

"Our trucks formerly entered Argentina free. We sold her practically all she bought. She now puts a 33 per cent tax on them. She put a 33 per cent tariff on pitch pine. That was directed at us, for she got almost her entire supply from the United States.

"In Europe everywhere tariff barriers are raised against our traders. The greatest increases are on those things we sell in Europe. Germany has doubled her rates on live hogs and edible beans and has imposed an impost ranging around 50 per cent on various other vegetable products from the United States. We sold her much of her lard. She made the tariff 90 per cent. Italy got a large part of her frozen meats from us until last year, when she loaded them with a 25 per cent tax. Poland got a big portion of her chemical supplies from us. But last year she raised the tariff so high it was almost an embargo. Spain makes no automobiles, so last year she lowered her duties on automobiles 60 per cent to all the world save the United States. We can not now sell an automobile in Spain.

"In January Americans woke one morning to find that our radio trade in France had been turned over to Holland and Germany. France uses tariffs, but she has also employed extensively another more deadly trade weapon—the quota system. She assigns to various countries an allotted percentage of imports which they may supply. In January she issued a decree restricting radio imports for the first three months of the year to 154.1 metric tons. Of this Holland was allotted 79.2 tons, Germany 50 tons, and the United States only 16.6 tons. This more than cut our business there in half.

"The American Chamber of Commerce in Paris on February 10 declared that if this quota system continued in France representatives of American firms in Paris might as well close up their offices and go home.

"All these new duties in these distant countries may seem remote and unimportant. But every time we hear of another tariff rate, another quota discrimination, another licensing arrangement, another embargo, another foreign control, we may be sure another group of American workmen have gone home to their families and announced the brave news that they have been fired. To date we may rest assured over 1,000,000 American wage earners have gone to their homes with this depressing announcement as a result of the losses in our foreign trade. Now, instead of foreign diplomats in Washington protesting against our tariffs, our State Department representatives in other countries are kept busy in the humiliating and preposterous business of carrying protests to foreign state departments about their tariffs against our goods.

"Now comes the most serious threat of all. Great Britain, after 90 years of free trade, goes over to the protective system. If England had just moved over to a protective system, the situation would be serious enough. But it is only now we begin to understand the grand design behind the new British tariff. It is a matter fraught with the gravest consequences.

"England has had good cause for alarm. For several years her own frontiers have been open to the trade of the world. It has flowed in. But slowly she has seen one country after another follow the example of America and build tariff walls shutting out England's goods. Great Britain is our biggest customer. Her ports have been open to us. But our ports have been closed to her. In 1931 she saw her foreign sales drop off a billion and a half dollars. So in November last year she passed her abnormal importations act, in reality an antidumping measure, permitting her ministers to impose on non-Empire importations duties in their discretion up to 100 per cent. A few duties were imposed under this act. But more far-reaching plans were being concerted. In February of this year Parliament passed a general tariff law imposing duties of 10 per cent on all importations except wheat, raw cotton, raw wool, and a few other commodities.

WE'LL BE ON THE OUTSIDE

"We will now see England's wide-reaching and long-ranging plans unfold. She has adopted her tariffs chiefly as a weapon to be used to bargain with other nations. The New York Times printed a dispatch from London in January, ascribed to Mr. Thomas, Secretary of State for Dominions, that England now proposes to use her new tariff to make openings for herself in the tariff walls of other countries.

"First she has her own dependencies, which constitute a large group of nations comprising a fourth of the earth's population. These will all be included in a vast customs union within which there will be comparative free trade. Next, with her own tariffs as a weapon, she counts on bringing numerous other countries—chiefly those off the gold standard—to join with her in a series of preferential tariff relations. She will begin with Denmark and the Argentine. Then she will seek to include Holland, Sweden, Egypt, and many other countries. The British tariff walls will be opened for those countries which open their walls to her.

"In the end England will create a vast world area of low-tariff nations which will be able to trade among themselves with comparative fredom. Outside—and we will be on the outside—will be another group of nations surrounded with almost impassable tariff walls. The world will be literally divided into two trade camps—low tariff and high tariff. We will be in one of those groups—the high-tariff group.

"In our group, however, the trouble will be that around every nation will be a more or less impenetrable wall. We will not be able to trade with one another. Nor will we be able to penetrate into the other group. For while this group will be free within its own walls, there will be a great impassable wall around it to keep us and the nations in our high-tariff group out.

"If this design succeeds it will automatically remove from our market a large portion of the prosperous nations of the world. It will leave to us only a batch of nations which singly keep us out quite as effectively. It is a matter of profound seriousness and we are doing absolutely nothing about it.

"A part of this movement will be the removal of a considerable portion of our manufacturing plants to other countries. To-day Canada—thirtieth in population among the nations of the world—is fifth in foreign trade. The serious thing about this is that a large part of Canada's foreign trade is due to the existence of American plants in Canada. There are to-day over 1,100 such concerns with factories in Canada, manufacturing goods for export from Canada, and making those goods in factories manned by Canadian workers instead of by our own workers. Why? Because our manufacturers can export from Canada to British dominions at lower tariffs and can get the benefit in other countries of the preferential rates which Canada has negotiated.

"Ten American factories crossed the border into Canada in flight from the tariff mess in the last two months. If England's great plan succeeds the flight will be infinitely more serious. An English newspaper reports that 40 American plants are now negotiating for space in Manchester.

"If England and Canada can make preferential agreements with other nations, why can not we? In other words, is not the one way out of this difficult situation to enter into a series of reciprocity agreements with other nations?

"We are practically stopped from negotiating any reciprocity treaties with other countries because we are bound, hand and foot, by the so-called 'most-favored nation' treaties which we have with other countries. France makes fine gloves. We need them. She needs our wheat. We could make a reciprocity treaty with France admitting her gloves free or at a low tariff in return for free admission of our wheat. But we have 'an unconditional most-favored nation' treaty with Czechoslovakia, which also makes gloves and which would thus be able to claim the same preferential rate. In whatever direction we turn we meet this obstacle.

SHORTSIGHTED STATESMANSHIP

"For this we can thank our State Department in the last 10 years. The new treaties made by our State Department are all irrevocable for a number of years. Only last year we made one with Austria which can be terminated only after 1938 and then only after one year's notice. A new treaty with Honduras does not expire until 1938. One with San Salvador must run until 1940. The State Department has fastened upon us 17 such treaties and 38 agreements.

"What, then, can we do about all this? What course should we pursue? Should we lower our tariffs? I predict that the next demand will be for higher tariffs. England and 15 other nations have gone off the gold standard. This means, in effect, that our tariff has already been lowered to such countries. Thus an article which England formerly sold to us for a pound we can still buy for a pound. But formerly to get the pound to pay for it we had to spend $4.86. Now we buy the pound for about $3.80. It means a 20 per cent cut in British prices. As a result, American manufacturers are already complaining, already organizing and moving around Washington to demand that we make our tariff rates even higher.

"That movement I think should be resolutely resisted. But, on the other hand, the situation works out as a great injustice to those countries which have not gone off the gold standard. Our tariff wall is still as high as ever to those countries.

"We can not lower our tariffs. We must not increase them. We must suffer the tariff inequalities which result from so many countries' being off the gold standard. We can not correct these with reciprocity agreements. We can not get rid of the treaties.

"What is the way out? Hopeless as it may seem, there is a way out and a way well within our reach. First we must put an end to the policy of tariff boosting. America, which led the world into this intolerable tangle, must now try to find a way to lead the world out of it. Manufacturers, producers, farmers, consumers must say with unmistakable emphasis that, if we can not lower our tariff, we certainly are not going to permit it to be increased. No more tariff boosting! That should be our slogan.

"Next we must put an end to the making of 'most-favored nation' treaties designed to kill off reciprocity. Moreover, we must give notice of abandonment of such treaties as fast as possible under their terms.

"Finally, we have got to sit down at the council table with the rest of the world and talk the whole troublesome problem over. We must summon other nations to sit with us in an international economic conference or council and see if, by a policy of give and take, we can not make a beginning of lowering, along the frontiers of all the nations of the world, the inhospitable walls which now shut out trade, intercourse, good will, and good understanding."

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for half a moment?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, earlier in the day, when the gentleman made his announcement that he desired the House to adjourn over until Monday, I said I would object because I felt there was more or less important business to transact and the House should not adjourn over. Since then, I have had time to think about the matter, and I do not desire to call the House in session to-morrow unless we can accomplish something. I would like to inquire of the majority leader of the House, for the benefit of ourselves, so that we will not go on in the dark in the future, and for the benefit of the country, whether or not we may expect——

Mr. O'CONNOR. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman from Illinois has yielded to me.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BRITTEN. The regular order is that the gentleman from Illinois had the floor and yielded to me for half a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], let me say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], asked unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock Monday. The gentleman from New York has demanded the regular order. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 10600. An act to exempt from the quota husbands of American citizens;

H. J. Res. 336. Joint resolution construing section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930; and

H. J. Res. 462. Joint resolution making an appropriation to provide transportation to their homes for veterans of the World War temporarily quartered in the District of Columbia.

JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 462. Joint resolution making an appropriation to provide transportation to their homes for veterans of the World War temporarily quartered in the District of Columbia.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, July 11, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. McLEOD: A bill (H. R. 12932) to amend section 204 of Public Act No. 212, Seventy-second Congress; to the Committee on Economy.

By Mr. CABLE: A bill (H. R. 12933) to provide for the sale of internal-revenue stamps by postmasters in cities of over 2,500 inhabitants; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BULWINKLE: Resolution (H. Res. 282) authorizing the appointment of a committee of seven Members of the House of Representatives to investigate the executive departments and independent offices; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. ALMON: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 465) to amend the revenue act of 1932 by repealing section 751 imposing a tax on checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DISNEY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 466) relating to the payment of interest in connection with certain judgments and overpayments of taxes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BRUNNER: A bill (H. R. 12934) granting Robert C. O'Brien the privilege of filing application for benefits under the emergency officers' retirement act; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. CRAIL: A bill (H. R. 12935) for the relief of J. T. Roache; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. EVANS of California: A bill (H. R. 12936) granting a pension to Anna B. Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FOSS: A bill (H. R. 12937) for the relief of Emil Siegmund; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McLEOD: A bill (H. R. 12938) to reinstate Norman B. Conger as senior meteorologist in the weather bureau at Detroit, Mich.; to the Committee on the Civil Service.

By Mr. SCHAFER: A bill (H. R. 12939) granting a pension to Mollie Withrow; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TREADWAY: A bill (H. R. 12940) for the relief of Dwight H. Merrill; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

8516. By Mr. CRAIL: Petition of California Baby Chick Association, protesting the quarantining of baby chicks and other livestock shipments in interstate shipment; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8517. By Mr. HARLAN: Petition of 300 citizens of southwestern Ohio, favoring more adequate regulation of busses and trucks in interstate transportation, and protesting against Government subsidization of water and other forms of transportation; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8518. By Mr. STOKES: Petition of Philadelphia Board of Trade, advocating that it is essential to the public welfare that the question of the continuance of the eighteenth amendment, Constitution of the United States, be referred to a vote of the people at the next regular election, and that Congress be urged to take such action as may be necessary for confirmation of the vote thus recorded; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8519. By Mr. TIERNEY: Petition concerning the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8520. By the SPEAKER: Petition of members of the Republican wet bloc of the House of Representatives, requesting the opportunity of voting on a bill legalizing the manufacture and sale of beer; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE

SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1932

(Legislative day of Friday, July 8, 1932)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Reed
Austin	Dale	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Dickinson	Kean	Schall
Bingham	Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Black	Fess	Keyes	Shipstead

Borah	Frazier	La Follette	Smoot
Bratton	George	Lewis	Steiwer
Brookhart	Glass	Long	Stephens
Broussard	Glenn	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Bulkley	Goldsborough	McKellar	Townsend
Bulow	Gore	McNary	Trammell
Byrnes	Hale	Metcalf	Vandenberg
Capper	Harrison	Morrison	Wagner
Caraway	Hastings	Moses	Walcott
Cohen	Hatfield	Norbeck	Walsh, Mass.
Connally	Hawes	Norris	Watson
Coolidge	Hayden	Nye	White
Copeland	Hebert	Patterson
Costigan	Howell	Pittman

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent in attendance upon the disarmament conference at Geneva.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PETITION AND MEMORIAL

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the petition of the rank and file committee of the bonus marchers, signed by John T. Pace, chairman, praying that the $100,000 made available to be loaned to veterans for transportation to their homes be appropriated to feed and shelter the veterans now in Washington, D. C.; that Congress enact legislation for the immediate cash payment of adjusted-service certificates (bonus), and that final adjournment be not taken before such legislation is enacted, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COPELAND presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the United States, remonstrating against the entrance of the United States into the World Court, which was ordered to lie on the table.

DUTY ON PINEAPPLES—PUERTO RICAN VIEWS

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, on April 4, 1932, there was read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement by Mr. H. E. Miles, chairman of the Fair Tariff League, regarding the action taken by the Tariff Commission on the question of the duty on fresh pineapples. On May 2, 1932, a reply by Mr. J. N. McBride, general agricultural and land-settlement agent of the Seaboard Air Line Railway, giving Florida's side of this controversy, was read into the RECORD by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I now desire to present Puerto Rico's side of this question, and therefore ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a statement which I have recently received from the Fruit Growers' Improvement Committee of Puerto Rico.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

THE TRUTH REGARDING THE DUTY ON PINEAPPLES

It is indeed amusing to read the statement of Mr. H. E. Miles, chairman of the Fair Tariff League, which was read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Monday, April 4, 1932, by the Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH of Montana, regarding the tariff on Cuban pineapples. It is most amusing to read, especially, that part of the statement headed "When Is a Crime?" The very fact pointed out in this particular part of the statement is so applicable to the whole of Mr. Miles's statement that it should be brought to the attention of the Senate of the United States, of the Hon. Mr. WALSH, and the people of the United States.

Lord Kyslant's crime was that he falsified a public document, according to Mr. Miles, by saying nothing, by not telling all of the truth. Does not Mr. Miles commit the same offense, not probably of falsifying a public document but by deliberately endeavoring to mislead the august Senate body and the people of the United States regarding the whole truth of the pineapple tariff question and the whole truth of the production of pineapples?

What about Puerto Rico, possessed, owned, and governed by the United States of America, giving all of its trade to the mother country? Why does not Mr. Miles at least say something regarding the production of pineapples in Puerto Rico if he is to be free from the same charges that he points out in the crime of Lord Kyslant and the charges brought against the Tariff Commission? Why does he not go farther and speak the whole truth, explain to the Senate, have placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the fact that Cuba, even with the present tariff on pineapples, can still produce and place in the markets of the United States pineapples cheaper than Puerto Rico can do? Why does he not explain that on account of a ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States Puerto Rico can not defend herself against Cuba and can not be heard on tariff matters? Why does he not go farther and explain that there are at present over 4,000 acres planted to pineapples in Puerto Rico and the production ranges from 500,000 to 700,000 crates per year? Why does he not explain that this acreage is actually owned by American citizens, who depend upon this for their livelihood, and is not like Cuba, where the native Cuban planter is exploited by American corporations, who are in the business not for a living but for speculative purposes? Why does not Mr. Miles explain that the 4,000 acres in Puerto Rico provide a means of livelihood for 4,000 Puerto Rican families, but, nevertheless, American families, and counting 6 persons to a family, gives a living to 24,000 people? Why does he not explain that if the tariff on Cuban pines is lowered below what it is at present that Puerto Rican pineapple growers will have to go out of business, and these 24,000 American citizens will be deprived of their livelihood, with no chance of obtaining any further employment in the island? Why does not Mr. Miles be fair and explain to everyone that Cuba by coming into Key West can ship every market in the United States, but, nevertheless, dumps enough pineapples into the New York market to ruin this only market which Puerto Rico enters at the present time? Why does not Mr. Miles tell the whole truth and not place himself in the same position which he cites regarding Lord Kyslant? Why does he not explain what happened at the last hearing before the Tariff Commission in October, 1931, on this subject, and how Puerto Rico, the only part of the United States at present producing pineapples on a commercial basis, was prevented from being heard at the hearing? Why does not Mr. Miles explain that there are thousands of acres available for pineapple production in Puerto Rico which, if it were not for Cuba ruining the American markets, could be planted to pineapples and give employment to thousands of American citizens who are now unemployed and on the verge to starvation? Why does he not tell the Senate that Puerto Rico and Florida could supply all of the pineapples the United States could consume if they were given an opportunity by placing a higher duty on Cuba, so as to more nearly equalize the cost of production?

If he read all of the testimony, is fully familiar with all of the facts in the case, he surely knew the truth, but like Lord Kyslant, toward whom he points the finger of scorn, he did not tell all of the truth, but kept silent.

The truth of the pineapple-tariff situation follows, and Mr. Miles is aware of these things but avoided mentioning them.

Puerto Rico is the only part of the United States that produces fresh pineapples on a commercial basis at the present time. This industry is one of the most important industries of the island, giving work to thousands of American citizens. The pineapple growers in the island have always had a great deal to contend with, and their lot has not been easy. They had just built up their production to over 500,000 crates when the United States entered the war, and prices of potash, which is a necessary fertilizer, rose to such a point that it was prohibitive, and space for shipping became practically impossible to obtain. Production dropped to 116,000 crates in 1919. Then began a building up again after the war to 529,000 crates in 1929, at which time the hurricane hit the island. The tariff placed upon Cuban pineapples in 1929 stimulated plantings and in 1931 Puerto Rico shipped 704,000 crates. Due to the dumping of Cuban pines on the New York market in 1932, the extreme low prices that existed, the drought at the beginning of the season, heavy rains during part of the season, shipments in 1932 amounted to only 620,795 crates.

It costs Puerto Rico close to $3 per crate to produce, transport, and sell a crate of pineapples in the New York market. It costs Cuba less than $2 to produce, transport, and sell a crate of pineapples in New York. Even with the present tariff, Cuba can produce, transport, and sell pineapples in any market of the United States at less than can Puerto Rico.

One of the principal industries of Puerto Rico is constantly threatened by Cuba, and is doomed to destruction if the tariff on Cuban pineapples is lowered.

Puerto Rico buys from the mother country more products than all of the Central American countries combined, and more than any single South American country. The ability to continue to pay for this trade is dependent upon the protection that the United States gives Puerto Rican industries from foreign countries such as Cuba. There can be no argument about this—it is either protect her child by maintaining tariffs which will permit Puerto Rico to compete with the products from other countries or Puerto Rico will become a ward of the mother country and appropriations will have to be made for her maintenance.

It is true that Florida has tried repeatedly to obtain slips from Puerto Rico in order to again enter the pineapple business. There is to-day on my desk an order from Florida for 1,000,000 slips which will plant approximately 100 acres. If possible, this order is going to be filled, for it is Puerto Rico's desire to assist Florida in trying to build up their production of pineapples to the profitable business that it was before they were forced out of business by cheaply produced pineapples from Cuba.

Florida started Cuba in the pineapple business by supplying the slips necessary to set out their first acres. When the red wilt attacked the Florida plantings and the United States Department of Agriculture advised that Florida must obtain new, disease-free stock to replant with, Cuba placed an embargo on slips, knowing that Puerto Rico could not supply these. Puerto Rico also obtained their slips from Cuba at that time, and at one stroke of the pen the President of Cuba placed an embargo on slips in order to ruin the Florida pineapple business and to cripple Puerto Rico. Florida was ruined, as they had no place to obtain disease-free slips and could not use their own on account of the disease which was present. In Puerto Rico production was seriously crippled, but having no disease finally overcame the hardship placed upon them by the Cuban embargo.

What is the intention of the Senate of the United States, or the Government of the United States, toward this situation? Do they desire to lower the tariff recently placed upon Cuban pineapples, in order that the American speculators in Cuba can make a greater profit? Do they desire to create, during these times of economic distress and uncertainty, more jobs for foreign laborers in a foreign country? Do they desire to eliminate an industry from a part of the United States that at present feeds 24,000 American citizens? Do they desire to harken to Mr. Miles with his evasion of the truth, or do they desire to be fair, square, and honest with a portion of the great United States of America and grant Puerto Rico at least a chance to be heard upon a subject that is so vital to the economic structure of our small island?

We ask that some method be arranged whereby the pineapple growers of Puerto Rico can present their case before the Tariff Committee the next time there arises a hearing on the pineapple tariff. Imagine Mr. Miles, of the Fair Tariff League, through evasion, misstatement of facts, endeavoring to throw out of employment 4,000 American citizens, take the bread from 24,000 American mouths, throw into bankruptcy over 100 American pineapple producers, lessen the buying power of an American possession that buys more from the mother country than all Central American countries combined, and more than any single South American country, and all in the name of the Fair Tariff League. He speaks in his article of crime—the title of his article begins with the word "crime." Truly Mr. Miles's crime is greater than all, and he deserves no place on anything called fair, and a deaf ear should be turned to his statements and to the incomplete and untruthful statements of the so-called Fair Tariff League.

J. P. KLEIN,
General Manager, Fruit Growers' Improvement Committee of Puerto Rico.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 4949) for the relief of Corinne Blackburn Gale, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 991) thereon.

Mr. NORBECK, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4024) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to cancel patent in fee issued to Victoria Arconge, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 992) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 4964) to amend section 9 of the act of May 14, 1930; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COSTIGAN (for Mr. NEELY):

A bill (S. 4965) for the relief of James Evans Monroe; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4966) for the relief of George Yusko; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 4967) for the relief of the Mizrach Wine Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. THOMAS of Idaho:

A bill (S. 4968) to amend the Federal farm loan act, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. REED:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 195) granting permission to Hugh S. Cumming, Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service; John D. Long, medical director United States Public Health Service; and Clifford R. Eskey, surgeon, United States Public Health Service, to accept and wear certain decorations bestowed upon them by the Governments of Ecuador, Chile, and Cuba; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT TO HOME LOAN BANK BILL

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

NEGOTIATION OF TREATY WITH CANADA RELATIVE TO LOAD LINES

Mr. JONES submitted a resolution (S. Res. 265), which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to negotiate a treaty in conformity with article 2 of section 2 of the International Load Line Convention of 1930 between the United States and Canada, whereby the vessels of each of said countries shall be exempted from the provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish load lines for American vessels, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1929, so long as they shall remain in trade between ports on Puget Sound and adjacent waters of British Columbia and southeastern Alaska.

SETTLEMENT OF FOREIGN DEBTS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I submit a resolution which is very short. I ask that it may be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 266) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas it is stated in Associated Press and other dispatches appearing in responsible newspapers that the United States Government has expressed to foreign nations indebted to it a willingness to consider further reductions in the indebtedness of said nations; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States (which alone has power to modify the debt settlements heretofore made) has officially declared by House Joint Resolution 147 its unwillingness further to reduce the indebtedness of said nations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States is requested to inform the Senate whether there is any foundation for the statements made in said dispatches, and, if so, by what authority any representative of the United States has taken such action.

TRANSFER OF COLONIAL POSSESSIONS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask that it may be read and lie on the table in connection with the resolution submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The resolution (S. Res. 267) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to ascertain, if practicable, whether any of the European powers which are indebted to the United States as a result of the war and which received as a result of the war an allotment of Germany's colonial possessions would prefer to transfer such territory in whole or in part to the United States in payment in whole or in part of its indebtedness to the United States rather than to make payment in cash or whether any such power would prefer to assign to the United States in lieu of such cash payments any island or islands situated in American waters and subject to the jurisdiction of such government.

LOANS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. COUZENS submitted a resolution (S. Res. 269), which was ordered to lie over under the rule, as follows:

Resolved, That there is hereby created a select committee of the Senate to be appointed by the Vice President, consisting of five Senators, not more than three of whom shall be chosen from one political party, which committee shall be authorized and directed to investigate the loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and to ascertain any information or facts concerning such loans which the committee deems advisable that the Senate should have. The committee shall make a report to the Senate at the first meeting of the Senate in January of 1933, and shall also make such recommendations as the committee deems advisable.

DEDICATION OF REVOLUTIONARY CEMETERY, MORRISTOWN, N. J.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for publication in the RECORD of the address delivered by Commander William Seaman Bainbridge at the dedication of the Revolutionary Cemetery at Morristown, N. J., on May 30, 1932.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Efficient and distinguished mayor, comrades, ladies, and gentlemen, multitudes at Bunker Hill, Concord, and Lexington rose against those who invaded the rights of a liberty-loving people. At Valley Forge an unorganized army, almost hopeless, with little food and clothing and insufficient ammunition, faced almost certain defeat because of exhaustion, yet carried on with fortitude, courage, and determination. At Morristown there were similar privations and suffering added to the scourge of a pestilential disease. But it was here that the Continental Army was really raised and organized. The leaders here quietly evaluated the situation, took stock of the enemies not only at home but abroad, and laid their plans. We can well imagine how their hearts glowed with rejoicing when Lafayette, landing at Boston, came directly to Morristown with the stirring news that his King was sending a fleet with Rochambeau and De Grasse. With the aid, too, of that able general, Von Steuben, plans were worked out which resulted in the victory at Yorktown, and the foundation of liberty, justice, and a representative government. Among the historic shrines of our country, Morristown will loom large on the horizon, for if there had been no Morristown there would have been no Arlington and no Gettysburg.

Each one of these touchstones of remembrance helps rekindle that spirit of courage and indomitable will to which we all owe what we have become as a nation. Our forefathers laid the foundation; those who have come after have built the superstructure, and if, in our growth, we have made mistakes, it is seemly that we review the past in envisioning the future so that we may be worthy of the trust imposed upon us.

And so to-day it is wise to heed the sign—Stop! Look! Listen! The onrushing train, when nearing a danger point in the road, is warned by a red light to slow down and take account of what is ahead in order to avoid disaster. In the medical world we are advising everyone to have a human "garaging" at certain intervals so that, if there is any danger signal anywhere, he may be warned in time for proper care to be instituted. Any machine, as we all know, must be looked after constantly, and what is true of a machine is also true of an individual, of a country, of a world!

We are passing through a period of discouragement, for the clouds obscure our vision. The unhappy conditions in our own country are repeated, more or less, in every land. We are not facing a national problem—we are in the midst of a world crisis! In our homeland we see overproduction, taxation, unemployment, starvation, bank failures, crime, and a lack of moral standards in high and low places. We seem, indeed, to be in chaos.

We need a well-formulated plan. We need real leadership under which we must put our own house in order and cease megaphoning directions to the rest of the world. We need a changed country and a changed world—a new order. We need a wider horizon and a broader outlook.

Any country fit to endure must possess certain qualities—qualities foreseen by those who signed that masterpiece, the Constitution of the United States of America. These attributes are liberty of thought and belief, freedom of speech, and the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We know the fallacy that lies in the tenet that all men are created free and equal—our institutions for the blind, the deaf, the insane, the mental defectives, answer that point. Therefore, those who are better off must help bear the infirmities of the weak. But everyone in every country should be free to live his life respectably. No nation is fit to endure, or can long endure, if it does not give every man and woman who can work, and desire to work, an opportunity to do so, at a wage sufficient to enable them to live healthfully and respectably, with a margin to prepare those dependent upon them for life's battle, and also enough for a modicum of pleasure and recreation, which is re-creation.

Our whole civilization is on trial. Those forces that would destroy all that we hold dear are not born; they are evolved out of conditions that are dangerous and evil. Let us be careful to look to these conditions. Malignant organisms must have soil on which to grow and thrive before they can really do harm. In our effort to remove the cancer of the body politic, with its long tendrils in every direction seeking to strangle and destroy, we must, with even greater insistence, go back to causes and seek to eliminate them as far as is humanly possible, or dire consequences may follow.

It may be that the cry we hear from all humanity arises from the agony of a new birth—a new order, a new world, is being born. By actual personal necessity we are compelled to take an inventory of things as they are and look toward the future. The need for perfecting some economic plan to prevent the recurrence of the calamitous condition in which we now find ourselves is receiving more earnest consideration than ever before. We are no longer rushing onward at as mad and headlong a speed. We have observed the danger signal—stop! We are standing still and taking cognizance of our surroundings, realizing that we are almost at the brim of a precipice. The very fact of our realization is a decided gain. Though we do this by compulsion, the result may be good. More and more we are thinking of others, of their present sustenance and future care. To-day news is universal and instantaneous. We can be of almost immediate help wherever needed. We are no longer detached groups of humanity. We are recognizing and must continue to recognize the fact that we are not an insular people surrounded by barbed wire, but a small part of the whole, and without the consideration of all the parts we can not go on successfully.

In endeavoring to find a way out of our difficulties one thing is essential—we must have national security, for without this our problems can not be solved, chaos will result, and destruction be invited. We must hold fast to that which is good and which was given to us by our forefathers, and stand firm upon our foundation until convinced that a proposed change should be incorporated in our life, by clear reasoning, experience, and judgment, and not by a cataclysm or an ignorant revolt from restraint.

The true patriot must review the past in order to protect the future. The history of the world has shown that nations rise and fall as a result of their efforts in the trade markets of the world. George Washington left this axiom for posterity: "To an active external commerce the protection of a naval force is indispensable." And we may add that an adequate guard is needed for the maintenance of internal order and the repulsion of external enemies.

We are told in the Book of Books: "When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace" (St. Luke xi, 21). Surely no one desires to argue the fact that law and order deserve to be defended against the forces of crime, and that a city without a police force is open to depredations. A great nation without strength for defense of its rights is subject to the activities of others.

Recently Senator REED stated truly that racial rivalries persist in spite of everything we can say or do, and that so long as men can hurl a stone or lift a club they will fight if there is a will or need to fight. "And ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars; see that ye be not troubled for these things must needs come to pass; but the end is not yet."

Our Regular Army to-day consists of 132,000 persons, one-third smaller than in 1921. Thus, 1 person out of every 900 is in our standing Army. In so-called "disarmed" Germany it is 1 person out of every 600, in Great Britain 1 out of every 200, in France and Italy 1 out of every 105, in Japan 1 out of 300, and in Russia 1 out of every 250. In this day, when there is so much talk of disarmament, and yet when every nation is working and striving for the fullest possible armament, we in our country in which there is much to protect should certainly not further lessen our strength or weaken our position, for in strength well controlled and directed there is safety. "A free people," said Washington, "ought not only to be armed but disciplined, to which end a uniform and well-digested plan is requisite. To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace."

There is a picture that is indelibly impressed on my mind. A number of years ago, at the time of the war of the Druses, I went north on horseback with a friend and a dragoman over the hills of Judea. As I was visualizing in my mind's eye the events that had transpired in this region those many years ago, there suddenly appeared a mounted Bedouin chieftain. It was war time and everyone was not what he seemed to be. Our dragoman turned in his saddle and said: "Watch this man who approaches. When he comes near you he will say 'Salaam Alaikum'—Peace be to you—and you will answer, 'Alaikum Salaam'—To you be peace—but watch him when he comes near, watch him as he passes and as he disappears from sight. To go forward safely—look back."

The strength of a nation depends upon the youth harbored within its borders. Military training acts as a guide for the instability and restlessness of youth, which is always a great danger to any government. It is of value in affording work and association along rational lines, under self-imposed discipline, and makes for the ideal of good citizenship. The importance of doing a job at the right time and in the right way, so essential, is part of military training, and the young man is inculcated with a respect for organization and an ability to work successfully in an organization; such training induces promptness, definite and quick decisions coupled with good posture and bearing, and is one of the finest preparations for life in time of peace. Any course that aims toward the development of mental alertness, an eye for correct form, exactness and precision, mental and bodily coordination, the power and spirit of cooperation, initiative and self-discipline, courtesy, respect and obedience to authority, and the power and spirit of constructive leadership makes for the good of the man, his profession, his business, his country, and humanity.

You will remember Kipling's Ship That Found Itself. It is a very realistic picture of an imaginary ship caught in a gale at sea. The waves lashed against her, the wind blew madly, and soon each part of the ship was giving its opinion, arguing its cause, considering itself the main prop of the whole, for each could see only as far as its own vision. Meanwhile the forces from without became more aggravated; the gale was at its height. The ship plunged and swayed, nosed round and round, and seemed almost to capsize. Soon the deck beams, and sea valves, and capstan, and stringers, and cylinders, down to the smallest screw and rivet, began to realize that they must pull all together, that each part was dependent upon the other, and that in order to overcome the terrific forces attacking them from without, they had to combine their strength to enable them to carry their ship safely to port. In pulling together they had an awakened consciousness of the importance of each part, insignificant, or conspicuous, a confidence in and respect for the other's ability to do his job, which resulted in the success of the whole.

The good ship Uncle Sam is on the mighty deep. Storm signals are everywhere. The barometer is low. But this ship was constructed seaworthily. There is a jargon of voices, loud in misunderstanding. There are currents and countercurrents of effort to keep the ship in condition. The greater dangers are from within, but it is the gale from without that causes the various parts of the ship to realize that they must work together in harmony for their own safety, and that each part must do its share, for it is safe only as the ship is safe, and that there are other ships out in the same storm.

Let us to-day reawaken within us the spirit and ideals of the founders of this Republic. Times have changed and people with them. Relationships of time and space have altered. But the essentials remain. Let us put our antenna up and join in one great effort to get the direction from the Father of All, who can bring intelligent understanding, mutual confidence, and respect. We must heed the injunction, "Be strong," determined to do our part in this age as our forefathers did in theirs. Here in this sanctuary of historic remembrance let us rededicate the best that is in us to carry on—

"For the cause that lacks assistance,
For the wrongs that need resistance,
For the future in the distance,
And the good that we may do!"

LOANS TO STATES—SYSTEM OF HIGHWAYS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. NORBECK submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12445) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such program, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That this act may be cited as the 'emergency relief and construction act of 1932.'

"TITLE I—RELIEF OF DESTITUTION

"SECTION 1. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make available out of the funds of the corporation the sum of $300,000,000, under the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth, to the several States and Territories, to be used in furnishing relief and work relief to needy and distressed people and in relieving the hardship resulting from unemployment, but not more than 15 per cent of such sum shall be available to any one State or Territory. Such sum of $300,000,000 shall, until the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this act, be available for payment to the governors of the several States and Territories for the purposes of this section, upon application therefor by them in accordance with subsection (c), and upon approval of such applications by the corporation.

"(b) All amounts paid under this section shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, and, except in the case of Puerto Rico and the Territory of Alaska, shall be reimbursed to the corporation, with interest thereon at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, by making annual deductions, beginning with the fiscal year 1935, from regular apportionments made from future Federal authorizations in aid of the States and Territories for the construction of highways and rural post roads, of an amount equal to one-fifth of the share which such State or Territory would be entitled to receive under such apportionment, except for the provisions of this section, or of an amount equal to one-fifth of the amounts so paid to the governor of such State or Territory pursuant to this section and all accrued interest thereon to the date of such deduction, whichever is the lesser, until the sum of such deductions equals the total amounts paid under this section and all accrued interest thereon. Whenever any such deduction is made, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately pay to the corporation an amount equal to the amount so deducted. If any State or Territory shall, within two years after the date of enactment of this act, enter into an agreement with the corporation for the repayment to the corporation of the amounts paid under this section to the governor of such State or Territory, with interest thereon as herein provided, in such installments and upon such terms as may be agreed upon, then the deduction under this subsection shall not be made unless such State or Territory shall be in default in the performance of the terms of such agreement. In the case of a default by the State or Territory in any such agreement, the agreement shall thereupon be terminated and reimbursement of the unpaid balance of the amount covered by such agreement shall be made by making annual deductions in the manner above provided (beginning with the fiscal year next following such default) from regular apportionments made to such State or Territory from future Federal authorizations in aid of the States and Territories for the construction of highways and rural post roads. Before any amount is paid under this section to the Governor of Puerto Rico or of the Territory of Alaska, Puerto Rico or the Territory of Alaska shall enter into an agreement with the corporation for the repayment of such amount with interest thereon as herein provided, in such installments and upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon.

"(c) The governor of any State or Territory may from time to time make application for funds under this section, and in each application so made shall certify the necessity for such funds and that the resources of the State or Territory, including moneys then available and which can be made available by the State or Territory, its political subdivisions, and private contributions, are inadequate to meet its relief needs. All amounts paid to the governor of a State or Territory under this section shall be administered by the governor, or under his direction, and upon his responsibility. The governor shall file with the corporation and with the auditor of the State or Territory (or, if there is no auditor, then with the official exercising comparable authority) a statement of the disbursements made by him under this section.

"(d) Nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the corporation to deny an otherwise acceptable application under this section because of constitutional or other legal inhibitions or because the State or Territory has borrowed to the full extent authorized by law. Whenever an application under this section is approved by the corporation in whole or in part, the amount approved shall be immediately paid to the governor of the State or Territory upon delivery by him to the corporation of a receipt therefor, stating that the payment is accepted subject to the terms of this section.

"(e) Any portion of the amount approved by the corporation for payment to the governor of a State or Territory shall, at his request, and with the approval of the corporation, be paid to any municipality or political subdivision of such State or Territory if (1) the governor makes as to such municipality or political subdivision a like certificate as provided in subsection (c) as to the State or Territory, and (2) such municipality or political subdivision enters into an agreement with the corporation for the repayment to the corporation of the amount so paid, at such times, at such rates of interest, and upon such other terms and conditions, as may be agreed upon between the corporation and such municipality or political subdivision. The amount paid to any municipality or political subdivision under this subsection shall not be included in any amounts reimbursable to the corporation under subsection (b) of this section.

"(f) As used in this section the term "Territory" means Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

"TITLE II—AMENDMENTS TO RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION ACT

"SEC. 201. Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 5. (a) To aid in financing agriculture, commerce, industry, and housing, including facilitating the exportation of agricultural and other products, and to assist in the relief of unemployment, the corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans, upon such terms and conditions not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, to any person when in the opinion of the board of directors of the corporation such person is unable to obtain funds upon reasonable terms through banking channels. Any receiver of any national bank is hereby authorized to contract for such loans and to pledge any assets of the bank for securing the same.

"'(b) In the exercise of its powers under this section the corporation shall, so far as practicable, give preference to—

"'(1) Loans to, or contracts with (and the corporation is hereby empowered to make such loans and contracts), States, municipalities, and political subdivisions of States, public agencies of States, of municipalities, and of political subdivisions of States, public corporations, boards and commissions, and public municipal instrumentalities of one or more States, to aid in financing projects authorized under Federal, State, or municipal law which are self-liquidating in character, such loans or contracts to be made through the purchase of their securities, or otherwise, and for such purpose the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to bid for such securities: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in carrying out the provisions of this paragraph, from purchasing securities having a maturity of more than 10 years;

"'(2) Loans to corporations formed wholly for the purpose of providing housing for families of low income, or for reconstruction of slum areas, which are regulated by State or municipal law as to rents, charges, capital structure, rate of return, and areas and methods of operation, to aid in financing projects undertaken by such corporations which are self-liquidating in character;

"'(3) Loans to private corporations to aid in carrying out the construction, replacement, or improvement of bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, canals, and markets devoted to public use and which are self-liquidating in character;

"'(4) Loans to private limited-dividend corporations to aid in the protection and development of forests and other renewable natural resources, which are regulated by a State or political subdivision of a State and are self-liquidating in character; and

"'(5) Loans to aid in financing the construction of any publicly owned bridge to be used for railroad, railway, and highway uses, the construction cost of which will be returned in part by means of tolls, fees, rents, or other charges, and the remainder by means of taxes imposed pursuant to State law enacted before the date of enactment of the emergency relief and construction act of 1932; and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to purchase bonds of any State, municipality, or other public body or agency issued for the purpose of financing the construction of any such bridge irrespective of the dates of maturity of such bonds.

"'For the purposes of this subdivision a project shall be deemed to be self-liquidating if such project will be made self-supporting and financially solvent and if the construction cost thereof will be returned within a reasonable period by means of tolls, fees, rents, or other charges, or by such other means (other than by taxation) as may be prescribed by the statutes which provide for the project. All loans and contracts made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in respect of projects of the character specified in paragraphs (1) to (5) of this subdivision shall be subject to the conditions that no convict labor shall be directly employed on any such project, and that (except in executive and administrative positions), so far as practicable, no individual employed on any such project shall be permitted to work more than 30 hours in any one week, and that in the employment of labor in connection with any such projects preference shall be given, where they are qualified, to ex-service men with dependents. The provisions of this subdivision shall apply with respect to projects in Puerto Rico and the Territories to the same extent as in the case of projects in the several States, and as used in this subdivision the term "States" includes Puerto Rico and the Territories.

"'(c) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall submit monthly to the President and to the Senate and the House of Representatives (or the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if those bodies are not in session) a report of its activities and expenditures under this section, together with a statement showing the names of the borrowers to whom loans and advances were made, and the amount involved in each case, except that such statement shall not show the names of borrowers of the classes to whom loans could be made under this section before its amendment by the emergency relief and construction act of 1932, unless the loan or advance was made under subdivision (b) of this section.

"'(d) In order that the surpluses of agricultural products which have accumulated in public and private warehouses and elevators may not have a depressing effect upon current prices of such products, the corporation is authorized and directed to make loans under this section, in such amounts as may in its judgment be necessary, for the purpose of financing sales of such surpluses in the markets of foreign countries in which such sales can not be financed in the normal course of commerce; but no such sales shall be financed by the corporation if, in its judgment, such sales will affect adversely the world markets for such products.

"'(e) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized to create in any of the 12 Federal land-bank districts where it may deem the same to be desirable a regional agricultural credit corporation with a paid-up capital of not less than $3,000,000, to be subscribed for by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and paid for out of the unexpended balance of the amounts allocated and made available to the Secretary of Agriculture under section 2 of this act. Such corporations shall be managed by officers and agents to be appointed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under such rules and regulations as its board of directors may prescribe. Such corporations are hereby authorized and empowered to make loans or advances to farmers and stockmen, the proceeds of which are to be used for an agricultural purpose (including crop production), or for the raising, breeding, fattening, or marketing of livestock, to charge such rates of interest or discount thereon as in their judgment are fair and equitable, subject to the approval of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to rediscount with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the various Federal reserve banks and Federal intermediate-credit banks any paper that they acquire which is eligible for such purpose. All expenses incurred in connection with the operation of such corporations shall be supervised and paid by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under such rules and regulations as its board of directors may prescribe.

"'(f) All loans made under this section, and all contracts of the character described in paragraph (1) of subdivision (b), shall be fully and adequately secured, except that in the case of loans (other than loans of the character described in paragraph (1) of subdivision (b)) to States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, instrumentalities or agencies of one or more States or municipalities or political subdivisions thereof, or public corporations, the loan may be made if, in the opinion of the board of directors of the corporation, the payment of the interest on the loan and the payment of the principal of the loan are adequately assured. The corporation, under such conditions as it shall prescribe, may take over or provide for the administration and liquidation of any collateral accepted by it as security for such loans. Such loans may be made directly upon promissory notes or by way of discount or rediscount of obligations tendered for the purpose, or otherwise in such form and in such amount and at such interest or discount rates as the corporation may approve: Provided, That no loans or advances (except loans under subdivision (d)) shall be made upon foreign securities or foreign acceptances as collateral or for the purpose of assisting in the carrying or liquidation of such foreign securities and foreign acceptances. In no case shall the aggregate amount advanced under this section to any one person (including, in the case of a corporation, its subsidiary or affiliated organizations) exceed at any one time 2⅝ per cent of (1) the authorized capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation plus (2) the aggregate amount of bonds of the corporation authorized to be outstanding when the capital stock is fully subscribed.

"'(g) Each such loan may be made for a period not exceeding three years, and the corporation may from time to time extend the time of payment of any such loan, through renewal, substitution of new obligations, or otherwise, but the time for such payment shall not be extended beyond five years from the date upon which such loan was made originally: Provided, That loans or contracts of the character described in subdivision (b) may be made for a period not exceeding 10 years: Provided further, That loans or contracts of the character described in paragraph (1) or (5) of subdivision (b) may be made for a period exceeding 10 years when it is the judgment of the board of directors of the corporation that it is necessary to purchase securities as provided in such paragraphs and that it is not practicable to require the reimbursement of the corporation, within 10 years, through the repurchase or payment of such securities, or in any other manner.

"'(h) The corporation may make loans under this section at any time prior to January 23, 1933; and the President may from time to time postpone such date of expiration for such additional period or periods as he may deem necessary, not beyond January 22, 1934.

"'(i) No fee or commission shall be paid by any applicant for a loan under the provisions of this section in connection with any such application or any loan made or to be made under this section, and the agreement to pay or payment of any such fee or commission shall be unlawful.

"'(j) No loan shall be made to a railroad or to a receiver of a railroad except on the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Any railroad may obligate itself in such form as shall be prescribed and otherwise comply with the requirements of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the corporation with respect to the deposit or assignment of security hereunder, without the authorization or approval of any authority, State or Federal, and without compliance with any requirement, State or Federal, as to notification, other than such as may be imposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the corporation under the provisions of this section.

"'(k) As used in this section and section 8, the term "person" means an individual, a trust or estate, a partnership, a corporation (public, quasi-public, or private), an association, a joint-stock company, a State, a political subdivision of a State, a municipality, and any instrumentality or agency of one or more States or municipalities or political subdivisions thereof. As used in this section and section 15 the term "State" includes Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

"'(l) No loans shall be made under this section to a State, a political subdivision of a State, a municipality, an instrumentality or agency of one or more States or municipalities or political subdivisions thereof, or a public corporation, except (1) loans to assist in the relief of unemployment, or (2) loans of the character specified in paragraph (1) of subdivision (b).

"'(m) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation may make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.'

"SEC. 202. Section 8 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 8. In order to enable the corporation to carry out the provisions of this act, the Treasury Department, the Federal Farm Loan Board, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Interstate Commerce Commission are hereby authorized, under such conditions as they may prescribe, to make available to the corporation, in confidence, such reports, records, or other information as they may have available relating to the condition of persons with respect to whom the corporation has had or contemplates having transactions under this act, or relating to persons whose obligations are offered to or held by the corporation as security for loans under this act, and to make, through their examiners or other employees for the confidential use of the corporation, examinations of applicants for loans. Every applicant for a loan under this act shall, as a condition precedent thereto, consent to such examination as the corporation may require for the purposes of this act and that reports of examinations by constituted authorities may be furnished by such authorities to the corporation upon request therefor.'

"SEC. 203. (a) Section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is amended by striking out the words 'three times' each time such words appear in such section and inserting in lieu thereof 'six and three-fifths times.'

"(b) The first proviso of section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is amended by inserting after 'as set out in section 9' the following: '(as in force prior to its amendment by the emergency relief and construction act of 1932),' but the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to continue making loans to farmers under the provisions of such section 2.

"TITLE III—PUBLIC WORKS

"SEC. 301. (a) For the purpose of providing for emergency construction of certain authorized public works with a view to increasing employment and carrying out the policy declared in the employment stabilization act of 1931, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $322,224,000, which shall be allocated as follows:

"(1) For expenditure in emergency construction on the Federal-aid highway system, $120,000,000. Such sum shall be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture to the several States by the method provided in section 21 of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 23, sec. 21). The amounts apportioned to the States shall be available as a temporary advance of funds to meet the provisions of such act as to State funds. The amount apportioned to any State under this paragraph may be used to match the regular annual Federal-aid apportionments made to such State (including the one for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933), and when so used such amount shall be available for expenditure in paying the share of such State in the cost of Federal-aid projects. No amounts apportioned under this paragraph shall be advanced except for work on the Federal-aid highway system performed before July 1, 1933: Provided, That the amounts so advanced shall be reimbursed to the Federal Government over a period of 10 years, commencing with the fiscal year 1938, by making annual deductions from regular apportionments made from future authorizations for carrying out the provisions of such act, as amended and supplemented: Provided further, That all contracts involving the expenditure of such amounts shall contain provisions establishing minimum rates of wages, to be predetermined by the State highway department, which contractors shall pay to skilled and unskilled labor, and such minimum rates shall be stated in the invitation for bids and shall be included in proposals or bids for the work: And provided further, That in the expenditure of such amounts the limitations in the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented, upon highway construction, reconstruction, and bridges within municipalities and upon payments per mile which may be made from Federal funds, shall not apply. As used in this paragraph, the term 'State' includes the Territory of Hawaii. The term 'highway,' as defined in the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented, for the purposes of this paragraph only, shall be deemed to include such main State parkways as may be designated by the State and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture as part of the Federal-aid highway system.

"(2) For expenditure in emergency construction during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, $16,000,000, as follows: (A) For the construction and improvement of national-forest highways, $5,000,000; (B) for the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, etc., including the same objects specified in the paragraph commencing with the words 'Improvement of the national forests' under the heading 'National Forest Administration' in the agricultural appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, approved February 23, 1931 (46 Stat. 1242), $5,000,000; (C) for the construction, reconstruction, and improvement of roads and trails, inclusive of necessary bridges, in the national parks and national monuments under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, including areas to be established as national parks authorized under the act of May 22, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 16, secs. 403 to 403c), and under the act of May 25, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 16, secs. 404 to 404c), and national park and monument approach roads authorized by the act of January 31, 1931 (46 Stat. 1053), as amended, $3,000,000; (D) for construction and improvement of Indian reservation roads under the provisions of the act approved May 26, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 25, sec. 318a), $1,000,000; and (E) for the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of main roads through unappropriated or unreserved public lands, nontaxable Indian lands, or other Federal reservations other than the forest reservations, under the provisions of section 3 of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 23, secs. 3 and 3a), $2,000,000. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, respectively, are authorized to make rules and regulations for carrying out the foregoing provisions of this section with a view to providing the maximum employment of local labor consistent with reasonable economy of construction.

"(3) For the prosecution of river and harbor projects heretofore authorized, $30,000,000.

"(4) For the prosecution of flood-control projects heretofore authorized, $15,500,000.

"(5) For the continuation of construction of the Hoover Dam and incidental works, as authorized by the Boulder Canyon project act, approved December 21, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 43, ch. 12A), $10,000,000.

"(6) For expenditure by the Department of Commerce for air-navigation facilities, including equipment, $500,000.

"(7) For constructing or purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and light vessels for the Lighthouse Service as may be specifically approved by the Secretary of Commerce, $950,000, and for establishing and improving aids to navigation and other works as may be specifically approved by the Secretary of Commerce, $2,860,000.

"(8) For the engineering work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, Department of Commerce, heretofore authorized, $1,250,000.

"(9) For the construction of projects included in the report of the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, laid before the Senate January 25, 1932, which have heretofore been authorized or which do not require specific authorization, under the Bureau of Yards and Docks, Navy Department, $10,000,000, of which not to exceed $300,000 shall be available for the employment of classified personal services in the Bureau of Yards and Docks and in the field service to be engaged upon such work and to be in addition to employees otherwise provided for.

"(10) For emergency construction of public building projects outside the District of Columbia (including the acquisition, where necessary, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of sites and additional land for such buildings, the demolition of old buildings where necessary, and the construction, remodeling, or extension of buildings), such projects to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General from the allocated public-building projects specified in House Document No. 788, Seventy-first Congress, third session, $100,000,000. Such projects shall be carried out within the estimated limits of cost specified in such document, and in selecting such projects preference shall be given to places where Government facilities are housed in rented buildings under leases which will expire on or before July 1, 1934, or which may be terminated on or prior to that date by the Government.

"(11) For the construction and installation at military posts of such buildings and utilities and appurtenances thereto as may be necessary, $15,164,000, as follows:

"SEC. 303. No money shall be available for expenditure under this title in connection with a project in the District of Columbia, except as provided in section 301 (a) (11) and in section 302.

"SEC. 304. The last paragraph of section 6 of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 23, sec. 6), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'Whenever provision has been made by any State for the completion and maintenance of 90 per cent of its system of primary or interstate and secondary or intercounty highways equal to 7 per cent of the total mileage of such State, as required by this act, said State through its State highway department, by and with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, is hereby authorized to increase the mileage of the primary or interstate and secondary or intercounty systems by additional mileage equal to not more than 1 per cent of said total mileage of such State, and thereafter to make like increases in the mileage of said systems whenever provision has been made for the completion and maintenance of 90 per cent of the mileage of said systems previously authorized in accordance herewith.'

"SEC. 305. After the date of the enactment of this act, in the acquisition of any land or site for the purposes of section 301 (a) (10):

"(1) The period of solicitation of proposals by public advertisement shall be 10 days in lieu of 20 days;

"(2) In any case in which such site or land is to be acquired by condemnation, the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, shall not apply; and

"(3) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to expedite the construction of public buildings and works outside of the District of Columbia by enabling possession and title of sites to be taken in advance of final judgment in proceedings for the acquisition thereof under the power of eminent domain,' approved February 26, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 40, sec. 258a), in any case in which any land or any interest therein is to be acquired by condemnation, the Secretary of the Treasury, through the Attorney General, may, prior to the institution of condemnation proceedings, file with the clerk of the district court of the district in which such land is located a declaration of taking, containing the matters required by such section to be included in a declaration of taking. The declaration of taking shall be accompanied by the deposit with such clerk, to the use of the parties who may be found to be entitled thereto, of the amount of the estimated compensation stated in the declaration. As soon as practicable after the filing of such declaration of taking, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be posted in a prominent place upon the land a notice reciting (A) that the land or the interest therein is taken by the United States for public use, (B) that a declaration of taking in respect of such land or interest therein has been filed with the clerk of the court of the district, and (C) that there has been deposited with such clerk, to the use of the parties who may be found to be entitled thereto, the estimated just compensation for the land or interest therein taken. The Secretary of the Treasury shall give written notice similar to the posted notice, by personal service in the case of actual occupants of the premises or, if with reasonable diligence such personal service can not be made, he shall send such notice by registered mail directed to the premises, and he shall send notice by registered mail directed to their last known address in the case of all parties whom the Secretary ascertains have or may have an interest in such land, and he may give such additional notice by newspaper publication or otherwise as he deems necessary. Upon posting notice on the land, title to the land or interest therein shall vest in the United States, and the right to just compensation therefor shall vest in the parties entitled thereto. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause notice to be personally served upon, or if with reasonable diligence such service can not be made, to be sent by registered mail to actual occupants of the premises, setting a time (not earlier than 20 days after the service or sending of such notice) at which such parties shall surrender possession, and at the end of such time the right to possession shall vest in the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury may designate any person to serve any notice under the preceding provisions of this subsection and such person shall have power to enter upon such land for the purpose of posting notice or to make personal service of notice. If any such party fails or refuses so to surrender possession, upon summary petition for an order to surrender possession filed in such district court by or on behalf of the Secretary of the Treasury, the court may, by writ of assistance or other process, order the surrender of possession. A petition in condemnation shall be filed in such district court as soon after the filing of the declaration of taking as practicable. In any such condemnation proceeding, no further declaration of taking shall be required, and the provisions of section 1 of such act of February 26, 1931, authorizing the court to fix the time when parties in possession shall be required to surrender possession, shall not apply. If such petition for condemnation is not filed within a reasonable time after the filing of such declaration of taking, any person entitled to just compensation in respect of the property so taken shall be entitled to sue the United States in the court in which such declaration of taking was filed. The procedure in such suit shall be the same as in suits against the United States founded upon contract, except that such suit may be heard even if the amount of the claim is greater than $10,000 and except that the procedure for the ascertainment of the amount of just compensation shall be the same as such procedure in condemnation proceedings. If the petition for condemnation is filed prior to the time the commissioners in condemnation, jurors, or other persons charged with the duty of valuing the property are empaneled, such suit shall be dismissed, except that such suit and the condemnation proceedings may, in the discretion of the court, and under rules prescribed by it, be consolidated to such extent as the court may deem practicable. In any suit authorized to be brought under this subsection or in any condemnation proceeding involving land acquired in accordance with this subsection, the court shall enter judgment against the United States in favor of the parties entitled for the sum or sums awarded as just compensation, respectively, for the land or interest therein taken for the use of the United States and such judgment shall be paid out of the sums deposited with the court and such additional sums as may be awarded shall be paid in the same manner as sums awarded in judgments in cases in which the United States has consented to be sued. The provisions of such act of February 26, 1931, except as modified by this subsection, shall apply to all such suits or condemnation proceedings. The provisions of this subsection shall not be construed to be in substitution for, but shall be supplemental to, any method of acquiring land or interests therein provided in existing law.

"SEC. 306. In the construction of post offices and of buildings for post offices and other offices provided for in section 301 (a) (10), the Secretary of the Treasury with the cooperation of the Postmaster General may use such standard plans (heretofore or hereafter prepared) as may be most adaptable to the particular building to be constructed.

"SEC. 307. All contracts let for construction projects pursuant to this title shall be subject to the conditions that no convict labor shall be directly employed on any such project, and that (except in executive and administrative positions), so far as practicable no individual employed on any such project shall be permitted to work more than 30 hours in any one week, and that in the employment of labor in connection with any such project preference shall be given, where they are qualified, to ex-service men with dependents.

"SEC. 308. For each fiscal year beginning with the fiscal year 1934, there is authorized to be appropriated, for the purposes of the sinking fund provided in section 6 of the Victory Liberty loan act, as amended, in addition to amounts otherwise appropriated, an amount equal to 2½ per cent of the aggregate amount of the expenditures made, out of appropriations made or authorized in this title, on or after the date of the enactment of this act and on or before the last day of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the title proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"To relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by providing for and expediting a public-works program."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the report submitted on the emergency relief bill, being H. R. 12445, as amended by the Senate, represents the best efforts of the Senate conferees to secure an agreement on the pending bill. It will be recalled that the Senate struck out all the House bill, which carried a large amount for public works, including rivers and harbors and especially public buildings all over the land. The report was printed in the RECORD about three days ago when presented to the House; it has also been printed as a separate House report. So I presume every Senator has had an opportunity of familiarizing himself with it.

I must say for the House conferees that they showed a conciliatory attitude and yielded on a great many of the questions in conference. They receded from practically all of the House bill, especially the large public-works program, so the bill now, as set out in this report, is, with very few exceptions, the bill as approved by the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator said the conferees yielded. Does he mean that the Senate conferees yielded to the House?

Mr. NORBECK. No; I mean the House conferees yielded. I thought I made it clear that the House conferees yielded in a great many cases, so we come much nearer having the Senate bill than the House bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NORBECK. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. While I have read the report, I want to know whether I understand it correctly. I understand that under the Senate provision self-liquidating projects have a priority as to funds over loans to municipalities, corporations, and individuals. Is that true?

Mr. NORBECK. That is true.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me ask a further question. I also understand that no loans shall be made to municipalities, private corporations, or individuals until they establish, first, that they have adequate and sufficient security for the loan requested, and, second, that they have exhausted every effort to obtain the loan on such security through banking channels. Is that correct?

Mr. NORBECK. That is correct, and there are further requirements. They can only secure loans for certain purposes.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is, purposes that will bring about employment?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. President, briefly, theer are three subject matters or titles in the bill. The first one carried $300,000,000 for work relief. As it passed the Senate that was divided. The President was to disburse a part of it, and a part of it was divided among the States, to be disbursed by the governors of the States. The House bill provided only $100,000,000 for work relief, or relief work, all to be disbursed by the President through any agency that he might select, an existing agency or one to be created by him. The conference report leaves the amount at $300,000,000 as provided in the Senate bill, but in the disbursement features it comes nearer to the House bill and is not to be distributed by the President. It is in the form of a fund set aside, from which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may make loans or advances to States to be disbursed by the governors and to be charged back afterwards against the Federal-aid-highway funds, starting at the end of two years and deducting 20 per cent each year for five years thereafter, with a further proviso that if there are municipalities within the States that want to avail themselves of some portion of the State quota, they may do so and may become responsible for it, providing they can make a satisfactory arrangement with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and have the approval of the governor.

Title II deals with loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. They come in two classes—those that are intended to help banks, railroads, business institutions, municipalities, and industries, as well as loans to private persons; the others are those that are self-liquidating, which are expected to pay out, and as to which it is assumed the Government loans nothing but its credit. Time will tell how well that has been calculated. I realize that with changing price levels and changing wage scales, no one can tell exactly what future values are going to be, but it is believed, I may say, by the great majority of Members of this body, as well as by the conference committee, that a pretty safe plan has been worked out for that, and that it will bring a great deal of employment without being a drain on the Treasury.

The limited public-works provision in the Senate bill was retained, but the provision for a special bond issue of $500,000,000 was stricken out, upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Ogden L. Mills.

It will be recalled that the Senate bill carried a provision for a $500,000,000 bond issue. That led to the impression that there was provided an expenditure of $500,000,000 in that section, whereas the expenditure for public works was only $322,000,000. That was intended to help out on the Budget, but the Secretary of the Treasury came before the conference committee and convinced us that it was not wise to raise the amount by small bond issues and that the Government could finance itself better if we would give it a freer hand, so that when it wanted to sell bonds, it could sell them in larger quantities, that it now has authority to issue bonds and there was no need whatever for the requirements in the Senate bill. So it was agreed to strike that out and leave it optional with the Secretary of the Treasury.

For public works $322,000,000 are provided, but only $136,000,000 is definitely provided for, and that refers entirely to highway expenditures, including all classes of highways, forest trails, park roads, and so forth. That item is retained exactly as it left the Senate, but a provision was agreed on that other public works should not be undertaken unless the Treasury was in a position to bear the expense, though they will be proceeded with unless the Secretary of the Treasury certifies that the Treasury is unable to carry the burden at the particular time.

Briefly, the public-works program provided for in this bill is as follows:

Highways and roads	$136,000,000
Rivers and harbors	30,000,000
Flood control	15,500,000
Hoover Dam	10,000,000
Air navigation	500,000
Lighthouse Service and aids to navigation	3,810,000
Engineering work, Coast and Geodetic Survey	1,250,000
Yards and docks	10,000,000
Federal buildings	100,000,000
Construction at military posts	15,164,000

Of the public works, of the $322,000,000, $100,000,000 is for public buildings heretofore authorized. In fact, it deals with a group of buildings that figure up to about $130,000,000, so they can not all be built. But further there is, in effect, a provision that leaves it optional with the administration as to when to go ahead, and they will proceed with the construction when the Treasury and the Post Office Department decide that it is the proper time to go ahead, and it is not assumed that $100,000,000 will be required the first year. Buildings do not proceed with that speed; but some part of the $100,000,000 will undoubtedly be expended the first year, unless the financial situation is so hard that it is impossible to proceed with the construction.

As I said, however, the loan feature was the bone of contention. Originally, the view of the administration was that private loans should be made for certain purposes in a limited way. Secretary Mills came before the committee and asked that loans be authorized under certain conditions where they would lead to distinct employment; as, for instance, factories that wanted to install additional machinery—certain forms of capital investment. The president of Montgomery Ward & Co. came before us and advocated that plan. The president of the Baldwin Locomotive Co. came before the committee and indorsed that idea, and felt that something could be done if limited private loans were made—loans that would be safe, loans that would be sure to pay out, loans that would lead to undertakings, and loans that would bring employment, in the hope, of course, that it was going to bring on that long-hoped-for new psychology of confidence and that everything was going to start as a result of it.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORBECK. Certainly; I yield to the author of the bill. No one is so familiar with it as he is.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I do not know about that. The Senator is making a very clear explanation of the report. I thought this would be a good place to say that in addition to a number of representatives of our largest business concerns who came before the committee advocating private loans, the Senator ought to call attention to the fact that the President of the United States, in his annual message to Congress, said that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—should * * * make temporary advances upon proper securities to established industries * * * which can not otherwise secure credit, and where such advances will protect the credit structure and stimulate employment.

In other words, the President of the United States in that annual message, with perhaps some other limitations—although they do not appear in the message—advocated the very private loans that are now being proposed.

I may also call the attention of the Senator to the fact that when the President issued his denunciatory statement of the so-called Garner bill, criticizing the so-called "pork" provisions, there was not a suggestion that his opposition was based upon the private-loan feature of the bill.

In a letter to the American Society of Civil Engineers, which appeared in the press on Monday, May 23, the President recommended—the extension of the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation not only in a particular to which I called attention last December—that is, loans on sound security to industry.

Reiterating it there; and in his address to the Senate on May 31, 1932, the President advocated that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be authorized—to make loans to established enterprise upon adequate security for advancement of sound projects.

I thought this was a suitable place to add the President of the United States to those who at that time sought this authority.

Mr. NORBECK. I was not familiar with all this, but I am certain the Senator from New York would not make an incorrect statement.

Mr. WAGNER. I am quoting from the President's language.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I have not read this report. I did not know that it had ever been printed. Therefore, I am not familiar with its contents. I desire to ask whether or not there is a difference or a distinction between what the President originally recommended and what Title II of this bill asks for. Title II goes farther, does it not, and asks for loans to private individuals on private notes?

Mr. WAGNER. I may say to the Senator that an established industry may be owned by a private individual.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, well, it may be, of course.

Mr. WAGNER. It does not follow that it is necessarily owned by a corporation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no distinction whatever with respect to security between the House provision and the President's recommendation, being (b) on page 4 of his message delivered in the Senate on the 31st of May, with respect to security, the provision reading:

To make loans to established enterprise upon adequate security for advancement of sound projects that will increase employment, but safeguarded by requirement that some portion of outside capital is also provided.

That is the President's recommendation, which was the original proposal to make loans to private industry. The House provision is broader, in the sense that it provides that—to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, industry, and * * * unemployment—

Loans may be made "to any person," but the security required is the same as in the case of the President's recommendation.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield further?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. May I add that there is an additional precaution provided for in the conference report; namely, that the particular applicant must show that he was unable to secure credit in the ordinary banking channels. In addition, the Senator remembers that we put in the proposed act an authorization that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may prescribe rules and regulations as a basis for procedure under this very section.

It may be added that the Secretary of the Treasury himself appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee and also urged a provision for loans to private industry, just as requested by these eminent industrialists from different sections of the country. At that time the Senator from New York, who was on that committee, if the Senator remembers, resisted the efforts to enlarge the base of the loaning power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; but I have eminent authority for the compromise which I agreed to when the President at some time advocated the same character of loan.

I want to say, in fairness to the Secretary of the Treasury, that, of course, he advocated these loans to private industry for capital expenditure; and I should think, under rules to be prescribed, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could make similar limitations, perhaps.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, of course, I can only confirm what the distinguished Senator from New York says as to his attitude on this matter, and, I am sure, I am within the facts when I say that the Senate conferees all felt that this House provision for loaning was too broad; that is, it was impossible to carry it out, that it held out a lot of false hopes to the average man, and would only lead to misunderstanding.

I do not want to be critical. I admit there are two sides to this question. The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is correct when he says the House provision contains certain safeguards, and I might add the conferees added other safeguards, but it does hold out the hope that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to set up a new banking system—a Government bank where everybody can come and borrow. It would mean branches in every county in the Union—yes; in every village. Such a system could not be created hastily. There are not enough funds available for any such purpose. The Government has no money except the taxpayers' money and what money it can borrow from the taxpayers.

A system such as suggested might easily lend itself to political influence. It might become a great political machine, or if this force should be selected according to civil-service rules it might prove to be very incapable and inefficient. It might not only cause losses to the taxpayers but bring on other undesirable complications.

Speaker GARNER expresses my sentiments when he defines his position on that deal; but we all know that it is an impossible thing to carry it out. It is impossible to carry out the thought that is embodied in it. The conferees of the Senate shared the views of the Senate. We preferred not to hold out hope for something impossible—something misleading, but the House conferees had yielded on nearly everything in the House bill, and we finally reached the point where they stated frankly they would not yield any farther. To have insisted would have meant the breaking up of the conference. Realizing there are two sides to all questions, and that the House had a right to insist on their viewpoint, the Senate conferees yielded. We signed the report which is now before this body, and I shall vote to support it rather than take a chance on writing a new relief bill at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, while something has been said this morning about the attitude of the President in regard to the matter that is most controversial in character, here, I want to make very plain by the utterances that have heretofore been made just exactly what that attitude is.

Permit me first, however, to say that the most important duty that is before us now, the most important obligation that we can fulfill as representatives of our people, is to pass a relief bill.

No one man can dictate, of course, all of its terms. To no one man will every single phrase of that relief bill be satisfactory. There may be embraced within it some policies which some of us may deem to be unsound. There may be within it some particular phrases that many of us would alter. But, sir, after all, the great desideratum is a relief bill for the American people; and it ill becomes us, it ill becomes a President of the United States, it ill becomes any individual charged with a conscientious duty unto the people of this land, to stand in the way of any measure, even though it may not be wholly satisfactory to him, which will in this hour of distress and of want, of depression and of worse, have some promise of relief to those who require relief.

As I understand the proposition that is presented here, that is in controversy—I may speak with plainness and frankness, I presume—between the Speaker of the House upon the one hand and the President of the United States upon the other, it is whether or not, under this bill, loans shall be made to private corporations or to individuals. That, apparently, is the crux of the controversy that now exists.

Personally, I should prefer that such loans be not made, perhaps; but that is apart from the question. Around them are thrown certain securities in the bill. About them are certain obligations in the conference report that will make it impossible, it seems to me, if the administration desires relief and will administer the bill in the spirit in which it comes to us, for any real wrong to be done.

Now, sirs, something has been said this morning about the attitude of the President heretofore. I have gathered, as well as I could in the limited time at my disposal, the remarks that he has made on different occasions respecting specific loans to private corporations or to individuals.

If I recall the genesis of the dispute—I may be in error in this, and therefore I ask my friend from Michigan to correct me if I am—it occurred originally in the Banking and Currency Committee, where on the one hand were those who believed that loans should be public in character, if I may use the term, and on the other hand was presented the idea that they might be made to industry private in character; and that difference resulted in the final presentation to this body of the bill that ultimately we passed.

When that difference arose I think the Committee on Banking and Currency, if I am not misinformed, accepted the position that the loans should be public in character, and presented a bill accordingly. But who was it who asked that the loans be private in character? That is the inquiry now. Who was it who demanded that the loans that should be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the terms of the measure should be made to private interests and to private corporations? It was the Secretary of the Treasury, representing the President of the United States, who made that demand. So the beginning of the demand for private loans came from where? Not out of the thin atmosphere that is surrounding us, nor from any man in this Chamber; it came originally from the President of the United States himself.

In order that Senators may see that his words have in each instance where there has been utterance by him of the character that I indicate, I refer to various of his communications and his particular messages now, that the record may be clear.

If any man is responsible to the American people for the lack of relief to human beings in this land, it is just one man, one alone, the President of the United States, and he must take the onus and the burden, he must take the responsibility, if there be no relief bill passed by the Congress.

Originally, sir, away back in December, he pointed the way in the matter of loans. That has been referred to this morning. But in order that chronologically we may have exactly what has transpired, I refer first to his message of December last, wherein he made distinct reference to the matter. I may be in error as to the date of the message, but I will come to that in a moment. Originally, when the question was bruited, who was the one who made the proposition that loans should be private in character?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I may suggest that the first request came in the President's annual message to Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. In 1931?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was my recollection of it. Then various other messages succeeded that particular one. It will be recalled that on May 23, 1932, the President sounded what was termed his warning on public-works bonds, and in that warning, to those who represented certain engineering associations, he detailed exactly what plan he desired to have presented in the matter of loans. He said then:

> The extension of the authority of the Reconstruction Corporation not only in a particular I called attention to last December—that is, loans on sound security to industry where they would sustain and expand employment—but also in view of the further contraction of credit to increase its authority to expand the issue of its own securities up to $3,000,000,000 for the purpose of organized aid to "income-producing" work throughout the Nation, both of public and private character.

So that we find him first in his message in 1931 advocating loans of that character. We find, then, that in the letter he wrote, with some degree of flamboyance, to engineers in this country, directing it by way of comment to some individual who did not represent the engineers, nor was an officer of them, he still advocated loans of a private character and loans to private industry.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish the Senator, for the sake of those who want to read the RECORD later, would put the date of that letter into the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON. That letter was addressed to Richard S. Parker, American Society of Engineers, New York, N. Y., and was dated May 21, 1932. It was stated on the floor here—I know nothing about the fact—that there was no Mr. Richard S. Parker, and that he was not the president of the Society of Engineers. Be that as it may, it was an official utterance of the President of the United States.

On May 31, 1932, the President came before the Congress and addressed us upon the relief of economic conditions, and in the latter part of his address he said:

> (b) To make loans to established enterprise upon adequate security, for advancement of sound projects that will increase employment, but safeguarded by requirement that some portion of outside capital is also provided.

So, in the message, that memorable message, in which we were exhorted to balance the Budget, in that memorable message, still the view of December, 1931, the view of May, 1932, was again emphasized, and we were urged to present a bill which would enlarge the scope of the ability to finance itself of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that it might make loans from that enlargement to private industry.

Again, on May 12, 1932, a statement was given out by the President that was of like character. In that statement, as well, he referred again to the matter of loans that might be made, and in that statement he advocated lending to private industry and private corporations.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will my friend from California yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator recognize any difference between lending to private corporations, making loans to private corporations of a self-liquidating character, in which labor may be employed, and lending to a private individual on his note?

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, there is a difference; but any man who seeks to say to me that there is a difference between lending to a corporation and lending to an individual is merely speaking of tweedledum and tweedledee, for the individual may very soon, under our system and our laws, erect himself into a corporation, and under that guise, if it be that corporations alone are to receive loans, receive the loans for himself.

Mr. WATSON. After all, as I understand it, every recommendation made by the President, and adopted by some of our friends, was to the effect that any loan of that character, to what my friend pleases to call private corporations, must be secured, and must be for the purpose of producing more employment or labor; and, furthermore, if my friend will permit me, must be of a self-liquidating character.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right. Is the Senator from Indiana laboring under the delusion that this conference report provides for no security or for no overseeing of the loans that may be made?

Mr. WATSON. I have not read it. That is the trouble about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, I think we had better not debate it if the Senator has not read it.

Mr. WATSON. Has the Senator from California read it?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have.

Mr. WATSON. I do not know when. When did the Senator get it? I never saw it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The conference report was available three days ago.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the chairman of the Senate conferees, said but a moment ago here that the proposition was to lend money to individuals everywhere, on their own private notes, all over the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, Mr. President, there is not any such thing, as I read this particular conference report, in it.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Just to emphasize again a point which the President failed to state to the country in his criticism a few days ago, any loan which is made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation must be fully and adequately secured, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is the final judge as to whether that security is adequate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, the Senator is right.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is also the final judge as to the purposes for which the loan shall be made.

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And is vested with unlimited discretion.

Mr. JOHNSON. When my distinguished friend from Indiana, who has not read the report yet, but who seeks to debate it——

Mr. WATSON. No; I am asking for information.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right. Then such information as I have the Senator is welcome to.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. The statement was made, not as a matter of information but as a statement of fact, as I understood it.

Mr. WATSON. I inquired of the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. In that statement, as well, the Senator from Indiana said that the Senator from South Dakota had stated that they might make loans to everybody in christendom upon a simple promissory note. The Senator from South Dakota has just called to my attention the fact that he said nothing of the sort. But leaving out of view matters of little consequence like that, here is the situation: Loans may be made that are private in character, but first, they must be made upon adequate security. Secondly, the loans are absolutely within the power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to determine. So that there are two checks.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, may I add a third requirement? The applicant must also show that he was unable to secure credit through banking channels.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from New York if he will construe that last statement, that a prospective borrower must exhaust his means of securing credit elsewhere? What does that mean?

Mr. WAGNER. As I would construe it, if the applicant showed that he presented his application to a bank, and that the bank was unable or refused to give him the credit which he desired, although the security was adequate, that is all that he would have to show to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I was stressing the fact that there were two conditions precedent to obtaining a private loan. The first condition precedent to obtaining a private loan is that a borrower must present absolute and ample and sufficient security. The second condition precedent is that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall deem that he is entitled to a loan, and that he has presented the adequate, ample, and sufficient security. So that if you have confidence in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, of course, you are running no great risk by this particular provision.

While, of course, at first blush, to every one of us the idea of lending to private corporations and private industry is repellant, nevertheless where we must, in order to obtain a bill which will relieve the awful conditions that now exist, accept or reject that particular proposition, I prefer to weigh the advantages of relief under the bill to any thought of what might transpire with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation having its hand upon any private loans in the making of such private loans.

I have referred to certain of the things that have been said by the President. On Monday, June 5, again a statement was issued by the President upon this subject and again he said—and I read two paragraph so Senators may understand something of his mind upon the subject; that is, if their comprehension be sufficient and their discrimination acute, they may, if they think his view was of a certain character a brief period ago, indulge in the pleasing imaginative exercise of wondering why, if it were so for many months, it is different to-day. The two propositions that I read in the statement given out June 5 by the President are:

> Loans have been made to a number of agricultural, market, and livestock finance corporations, which, in turn, have enabled them to extend and continue loans, particularly upon livestocks, and loans to a great number of farmers. Beyond this, loans to the extent of $75,000,000 have been made directly to about 450,000 farmers for seed purposes through the Department of Agriculture. All together, probably 1,000,000 individual farmers have been directly or indirectly helped.

We are all glad to have aid extended to the farmers, but when we are speaking of the policy that is now before us as being one which is so bizarre in its character that it can not be considered, here is the boast of the President himself that 450,000 individual farmers have received loans from the Government of the United States, and his further boast that 1,000,000 men engaged in tilling the soil have been benefited. Then in the same statement he gives his conclusions as to policies:

> 1. In order at once to stimulate employment and to stiffen the whole agricultural situation, to extend the authority to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to increase its issues of its securities to the maximum of $3,000,000,000 to enable it (a) to buy bonds from political subdivisions or public bodies or corporations so as to start construction of income-producing or self-liquidating projects which will at once increase employment; (b) to make loans upon security of agricultural commodities so as to assure the carrying of normal stocks of these commodities and, by stabilizing their loan value, thereby at once steady their price levels.

So in every official utterance which has been made by the President of the United States up to the time that the unfortunate disagreement occurred between him and the House, we find the President advocating the making of loans of a private character, and making those loans probably no differently from the loans that would be scrutinized by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the particular measure now before us.

Mr. President, I have shown those things in justice to the controversy that now rages throughout the country. I do not need to suggest to my brethren here that I resent the way in which propaganda has issued from Washington—not only from the White House but in which some gentlemen who are in this Chamber have participated—reflecting upon the Congress of the United States and suggesting all sorts of remedies for the Government of the United States, either in the cessation of this session or the total abolition of Congress. I never had any use for the bird that fouls its own nest, and, sir, I unite with those of my brethren here who have stayed here these long hours in this grilling session—I unite with them in a resentment that is just, after these grilling hours and this difficult session, a resentment against the false, the unfair, the manufactured criticism which has been leveled upon the Congress of the United States.

Far greater, however, than any feeling respecting that propaganda, far more important than the difficulties which exist to-day between the House or the Speaker and the President—indeed, of far more transcendent importance than any of the things that may arise between any of us personally or with any administration—is the great subject with which we deal now and the necessity for acting upon that subject. I do not endeavor, sir, and I shall not, to paint the picture of what has happened in this land. I have said in days gone by, in talking upon kindred economic subjects in this body, that to-day every man I love, every man with whom I have associated for more than 40 years, every one of them is broke. Every one of them, thank God, has the stock in him that enables him to stand with his head high and in old age again fight the battle that he thought he had won by 40 or 50 years of clean endeavor. All over the land to-day are men and women who, through no fault of theirs, are suffering; suffering in some instances the direst want, suffering in other instances the loss of that which in a lifetime of fighting they had finally won.

These are the people of whom I think. We may call them "the forgotten men," and we may say that one who refers to them is a mere demagogue, if you wish, Mr. President. Sir, I take my place to-day and I take it in the months to come with God's own creatures, just men and women in this land, as good as you and as good as me, fit to live, with the right, by Heaven, to a job and to a little of God's sunlight. It is for them I appeal to-day for a relief bill. It may be, as has been asserted during the last few days, that we may pass this bill and the President will veto it. Let him take the responsibility of vetoing it if he desires. It is asserted, and I have heard it asserted, that immediately thereafter he will send another bill down here, and it will be crammed down the throats of the Members of the Congress, and because their hearts, the hearts of men who sit here that beat in unison with humanity demanding relief for just ordinary people to-day, the very holiest emotions that a human being can have, will be twisted and distorted to the demands and the dictatorial policy of one man in this land.

I cry out against it. Here is a measure of relief that we took weeks to pass. Here is a measure of relief that will do some good in this land. Here is a measure of relief, perhaps, to which we can not subscribe in every detail, but it is a measure of relief, Mr. President, and that measure of relief, no matter what the consequences may be, no matter what any man may wish, no matter what may be the exigencies of his political fortunes now, must not be halted or delayed, and no thought or consideration of any candidacy should be permitted to influence our view in the slightest degree. Greater, more important and compelling than all these, is relief to our people. The conference report ought to be approved, approved quickly, and we ought to stay here long enough, Mr. President, if the bill is vetoed, for us at least to vindicate ourselves and pass it over any presidential veto.

Mr. BULKLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to enable me to ask the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. BULKLEY. I do.

Mr. WAGNER. While we are on the subject, I would like to ask a question of the junior Senator from New Jersey. I want first to acknowledge his spirit of cooperation with the Banking and Currency Committee throughout our efforts to secure relief legislation. The Senator introduced a bill on behalf of the administration. I want to ask him whether that bill did not provide for loans to private industry?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; that is true. It did provide for such loans under the restrictions and regulations with which the Senator from New York is familiar.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to enable me to ask a question of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have those bills which were offered by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey before me, together with the amendments. I want to ask if they were not themselves both written by the Treasury Department at the instance of the administration?

Mr. BARBOUR. They were not. The bill which bears the earlier date I wrote myself and not at the instance of the administration, and it was introduced two days before the Senator from New York introduced his bill. Then at the request of the administration I did substitute the second measure for my original bill.

I would like to say at this juncture that, of course, there is a difference, as has already been pointed out by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], between private industry and private individuals. There was nothing in my measures with reference to loans to private individuals.

Mr. WAGNER. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey if an established industry were owned by a private individual instead of a corporation, would not that individual have been qualified to make application for a loan?

Mr. BARBOUR. So far as I am concerned, that would be a question for determination by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I was desirous of asking the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] a question or two, but if the Senator from Ohio is going to address the Senate I shall wait until he has concluded.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, when the committee which cooperated with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] in the drafting of what is known as the Wagner bill undertook its labors, it considered carefully the question of loans and advances to private industry, and it rejected that principle as being unsound, as being contrary to the principles and professed declarations of both of the major political parties. When the measure was considered in the Committee on Banking and Currency, again the question of advances to private industry was considered at length, and again it was rejected. The Senate itself rejected the principle of loans and advances to private industry.

Now we are asked to approve a conference report which proposes that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be authorized to make advances, with a very liberal enumeration of purposes, to all persons, including corporations, municipalities, and so forth.

If we are to surrender the views that were entertained by the authors of the Wagner bill, by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and by the Senate itself, to whom are we surrendering? It is true that the conferees on the part of the other House have firmly insisted on this principle. It is also true, as stated by the able Senator from California, that the suggestion to make loans available to private industry emanated from the President of the United States. It is not necessary to add to the evidence which the Senator from California has just presented to show that the President personally has advocated and insisted upon loans of this character. I desire, however, to take a moment of the time of the Senate to cite the testimony before the Committee on Banking and Currency by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, to show how recently and how urgently the President's view has been insisted upon and how direct is its bearing upon the very question that is before us. On June 7 Secretary Mills appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee, and when I suggested to him that he was criticizing the Wagner bill, he replied:

I did not mean to criticize it. I am here to talk in favor of the Barbour bill. I thought I had done all the criticizing of the Wagner bill that was necessary. I was prepared to let it sleep.

There can be no doubt that the Secretary's intention was to argue before the committee in favor of the Barbour bill as compared with the Wagner bill.

In order that the distinction between the two may be clear to the Senate, let me quote the following in Secretary Mills's own words:

There is one fundamental difference between the bill proposed by Senator WAGNER and the Barbour bill, and that is that the Barbour bill would permit the loans to be made to private corporations to finance the construction, replacement, or reconstruction of economically sound and useful projects, the construction, replacement, or reconstruction of which will provide employment at an early date for a substantial number of persons, provided, of course, that the project can be shown to be self-supporting and self-liquidating.

Again the Secretary of the Treasury says:

Now, Mr. Chairman, the real difference between Senator WAGNER'S bill and Senator BARBOUR'S bill is that Senator BARBOUR'S bill goes farther, in that it includes loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for capital purposes to private industry.

The distinction is clearly drawn. The force of the administration has definitely, as recently as June 7, been placed behind the principle of loans to private industry. If there be any distinction between the course which the Secretary of the Treasury advocated at that time and the conference report as it now lies before us, it is only in that the conference report has liberalized the provision as to loans so that they may be made to all citizens and not merely to the big interests.

The Barbour bill is limited to corporations, which, as the Senator from California has well pointed out, is a futile limitation; but it is also limited to those projects which will "provide employment at an early date for a substantial number of persons," and perhaps that is intended to confine the loans to large corporations and large enterprises. If that is not the intent of it, if that is not the distinction between the Barbour bill and the conference report, I fail to see any sound and vital distinction in principle.

Mr. President, if we are to yield the judgment of the Committee on Banking and Currency and of the Senate, if we are to accept the view that the Government is going to make loans to private industry, I submit that we are surrendering not only to the House of Representatives but we are surrendering to views expressed by the President of the United States and by the Secretary of the Treasury in behalf of the administration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask a question of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who I know is familiar with the measure. I want to ascertain the exact condition upon which loans may be made to private corporations and to individuals and what safeguards are thrown around such loans.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, in the first place, such loans must be either to aid commerce, industry, or agriculture, or to aid in relieving unemployment, and the applicant must show that he has attempted to secure the credit through banking channels; secondly, he can not obtain the loan unless it is fully and adequately secured. That, of course, is the matter which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation must determine.

Mr. BORAH. There is no difference with reference to the conditions under which loans may be made to private corporations and individuals, so far as the kind of security is concerned and the purpose for which the loan may be made, is there?

Mr. WAGNER. No.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss this question at any length. I preface what I desire to say by stating that the whole theory of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is objectionable and would not be tolerated, of course, if it were not for the great exigency with which we have to deal. We have provided, however, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the extraordinary program which, to some extent, is now being carried out throughout the country. As I understand, the only difference now between those who take different sides on this question is on the question of affording loans to private corporations and to individuals instead of to public institutions.

I do not understand, Mr. President, why there should be any serious objection, leaving aside now the question of practical administration, to loaning to an individual or to a private corporation, in view of the policy which has already been inaugurated and the program which has been initiated under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. If a private corporation has sufficient security to satisfy the board, and if it is to use the loan for the purpose provided in the bill, and upon which the board must pass, or if an individual has security which is satisfactory to the board and is to use the loan for the purpose provided in the law and which is to be passed on also by the board, I can not see any objection to authorizing such a loan, in view of the fact that all loans are being made and the entire program is for the purpose of aiding the present situation and giving employment to the unemployed. If an individual or a private corporation has a plan or a program which will give employment to a thousand or five thousand people and has sufficient security to satisfy the board and proposes to invest the proceeds of a loan in a way which will give assurance that employment will be provided, in view of the fact that the entire program is for the purpose of giving employment to the unemployed, I can not see any objection to authorizing loans to the private corporation and to individuals. This is not a banking bill but a relief bill, and if individuals have the security and are prepared to bring themselves within the law and to give employment I feel like permitting them to do so.

I realize that such a provision may be difficult of administration, but when we consider the limitations which are placed upon the advancement of these loans to private corporations and to individuals, it does not seem to me that very many individuals will ever be accommodated under this proposed law. In the last analysis, it is not the many who will be accommodated, but the few who will be accommodated, in my judgment, which will be a disappointment to the country, and not, as has been indicated in some quarters, that it will establish a socialistic system throughout the United States.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am supporting the conference report purely as a program to aid unemployment and relieve the economic situation, to better conditions, if it be possible through this kind of a program to better them, and I can not see any difference between the proposition of loaning to public institutions and that of loaning to individuals and private corporations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he sits down?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to call attention to what the President said about it on May 31, in his message to Congress:

I have favored an authority to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to increase its issues of its securities to the maximum of $3,000,000,000 in order that it may extend its services, both in aid to employment and agriculture on a wide scale. Under the methods proposed the corporation is to be authorized (a)—

I omit "(a)" and read—

(b) To make loans to established enterprise upon adequate security for advancement of sound projects that will increase employment, but safeguarded by requirement that some portion of outside capital is also provided.

Is not that exactly what is proposed in the conference report?

Mr. BORAH. I think so, but it is immaterial to me whether the President has changed his mind or whether he has not. I am looking at it purely, Mr. President, as to whether or not it will accomplish that which we have in mind, to wit, to relieve unemployment throughout the United States. I would under no consideration vote for anything of this kind were it not the hope I entertain that we may give some people employment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FESS, Mr. VANDENBERG, and others asked for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FESS. Let us have the other side.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no other side.

Mr. FESS. There is. We want a count.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair holds there is no other side on the question of ascertaining whether the demand for the yeas and nays is seconded. The requirement is that the demand must be seconded by one-fifth of the Senators present, and there were not one-fifth who seconded the demand.

Mr. FESS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will again put the request. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DICKINSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HOWELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. I understand that he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I understand that he would probably vote as I expect to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SCHALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. I understand that if he were present, he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Not knowing his views, I withhold my own.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], and will vote. I vote "nay." I desire to state that the Senator from Colorado, if present, would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE]. If the Senator from Montana were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is necessarily absent. I am authorized to say that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. BULKLEY (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce a pair between the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] and the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If the Senator from Nevada were present, he would vote "yea," and if the Senator from Maryland were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] has a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I do not know how either Senator would vote.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] is necessarily detained on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily out of the city.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—43

Ashurst	Copeland	Jones	Pittman
Barbour	Costigan	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.
Borah	Dill	Lewis	Robinson, Ind.

So the report was agreed to.

HOME-LOAN BANKS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have been urged to withdraw this amendment in view of the fact that it is thought to compromise the pending bill and perhaps defeat it. I am the only one interested in it; and personally I should be willing to do so, provided we can have a definite time set for voting upon it as an original measure in the immediate future.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. To that end, I ask unanimous consent that the measure sponsored by the Senator from Idaho may be made the special order for next Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. COUZENS. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I shall not approve of that action unless there is an agreement to vote on this bill; and that, as I understood, was the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It has been debated here now for a full day, and probably not very much further debate will be necessary to enable the Senate to reach a conclusion on this measure. I have no objection to making it a special order and segregating it from this bill if an arrangement can be entered into that will assure its final disposition; but we are getting down now to the heel of the session. Conference reports remain undisposed of; and I do not wish to be put in the attitude of taking a whole day to debate this amendment, as we took several days to debate the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, and then have both of them withdrawn with no decision on either measure.

I suggest a modification, that after the measure has been under consideration for one hour——

Mr. WATSON. Make it two.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Two hours, that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. WATSON. I accept the modification.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I object to that on behalf of myself and several others. We have had this matter up for a whole day. Have I the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I will yield to the Senator, but before I do so allow me to say that of course, if there can not be an agreement to take up this bill at a definite time in the immediate future and vote upon it, I shall not withdraw the amendment. The Senator from Indiana was urging me to do so because he thought it imperiled the pending measure, which I do not desire to do, but if we can not have a definite time to vote on it in the immediate future, I shall leave the amendment where it is. I am in favor of the home loan bill and I am very much in favor of the amendment I have offered. If I can not get an agreement to vote on this amendment as an original bill, I must endeavor to put it on this bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection has been made by the Senator from Louisiana.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Virginia is about to ask me a question, which I should like to hear.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I desire to suggest that even if there could be an agreement to vote on this matter as an independent proposition, we are so far advanced in the session, and probably so near the end of the session, that as an independent proposition we might not get action on the bill in the House.

Mr. BORAH. In view of the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, I certainly shall not withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, instead of fixing a time to vote on this particular amendment which the Senator offers, I suggest that we fix a time to vote on the House bill, H. R. 11499, which contains the amendment. Then there might be a chance of getting it to conference.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, my proposition included the original bill. I did not ask for a vote on this amendment, but upon the bill as it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I see. Then that might go to conference.

Mr. BORAH. But it is useless to delay the matter, because there is objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that if this amendment be attached to the home loan bill there are enough Senators on this side who are opposed to the amendment to defeat the bill. That would end the bill.

I want to do anything and everything in the world to keep this bill from being defeated, because I think at this particular time it is absolutely essential that it shall be passed.

Therefore, in order that we may definitely fix a time when we shall vote upon H. R. 11499 as a separate proposition—that is the measure that is now being sponsored by the Senator from Idaho as an amendment to the pending home loan bill—I move that it be made a special order next Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, and that the conditions stated by the Senator from Arkansas shall be appended to it; that is to say, that after two hours of debate no Senator shall be permitted to speak oftener than once or longer than 10 minutes.

Mr. LONG. I object to that.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MOSES. A proposition to make a piece of legislation a special order, which requires a two-thirds vote of the Senate, can not be "hooked up," as the Senator from Indiana expresses it, with that which requires a unanimous-consent agreement, namely, a limitation of debate and a time for a vote.

Mr. WATSON. I assume that is so, but I would like to have the ruling of the Chair on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. Without any limitation then, I move that the bill referred to by the Senator from Idaho be made the special order for next Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not believe it is in order to make this motion because House bill 11499 is not under consideration. It would be necessary to lay aside, temporarily or otherwise, the pending bill, the home loan bank bill, in order to take up the motion of the Senator, unless it were done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true, I will say to the Senator. I appreciate that parliamentary difficulty. Of course, if I were to move, as the Senator from Arkansas well knows, to proceed to the consideration of House bill 11499, that would displace the home loan bank bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. And I do not want to do that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has no remedy, as I see it now, except to have a vote on the pending amendment, unless the Senator from Idaho should see fit to withdraw it, in which event somebody else would probably offer it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to withdraw it, unless we can have a definite time to vote fixed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

SENATOR BINGHAM'S WITHDRAWAL OF HIS SUPPORT FOR BEER

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. WATSON rose.

Mr. LONG. I am recognized, and I will yield to the Senator from Indiana, but I do not want to yield the floor. It was taken away from me once before.

What I want to say is that the Senate has been treated to an immense amount of horseplay from the other side of the Chamber——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that it is hardly proper to charge Senators with horseplay.

Mr. LONG. I mean that in a charitable sense. I will explain what I mean. I do not mean to reflect upon anyone.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] took up about three days' time of the Senate with a beer amendment to the home loan bank bill, as the beer leader of the Senate, and after taking up three days' time haranguing the Democratic Party to the effect that he wanted them to assist him, to my amazement and surprise this morning I read that he has withdrawn the beer amendment, and left us here, with three days gone, and no beer amendment, and hence no beer. [Laughter.]

I am unable to understand just what we are to make out of this very queer situation. I was told by some of my colleagues when I first came to the Senate that my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] had only within the last year or so, perhaps a little longer, absorbed such immense enthusiasm for the return of beer, but after the fervor with which he has waged this war here for three days, Senators sitting here ready to vote with him for his amendment, with three days' time of Congress gone, with the session about to close, lo and behold, with no rhyme or reason or excuse, the beer amendment has been withdrawn by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], and now the Senate is here without any beer amendment before it in any form.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Senator had read further in the morning paper——

Mr. LONG. I did not read it in the paper.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thought the Senator had read it in the paper.

Mr. LONG. No; in the RECORD.

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not know that the Senator had not read the paper. He would have discovered that the reason for withdrawing the amendment was so as to offer it later in order that we might get a direct vote upon it. As soon as the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, which was used as a cloak to prevent a vote on the beer amendment, has been disposed of, the beer amendment will be offered again.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I can not understand that. The Senator has evidently misunderstood his own motion, because he offered the beer amendment as a part of a home loan bank bill, and now he makes the explanation that because somebody else offered something that was not germane to the subject he had to retreat from the beer proposition and lose three days' time and withdraw his amendment.

I have only a very illiterate, lay mind in matters of legislation, but in common, ordinary, sawmill understanding I can not for the life of me apprehend how the thirsty people of this Nation are going to understand and appreciate a beer amendment having been withdrawn under fire and three days' time gone and the Senate apprised that Congress is soon to adjourn.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I am curious to know whether my eminent friend the Senator from Louisiana feels that in the present situation he has just described he has no opportunity for further drinking in any inspiration?

Mr. LONG. I think the Senator has misunderstood my motive. It was not inspiration or the opportunity to drink I sought, but it was my unselfish desire to place others in the same position I occupy in this respect since the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. President, I now am going by circumstantial evidence to be led into the belief from what I now see in the morning paper that evidently this was not an act of mistake but a design of the Republican organization. Here is a statement in this morning's paper from Mr. Garfield, who I understand presided over the committee on resolutions of the Republican National Convention which nominated Mr. Hoover. I now quote from Mr. Garfield's statement, in which he tells the attitude of the Republican Party:

> We will be unalterably opposed to any modification of the Volstead Act, opposed to repeal, and everything else except to give the people the right to vote on the issue. Until they have expressed their sentiment at the polls, there will be no change in the administration attitude on prohibition.

So I take it, having attended a conference at the White House and announced this as the attitude of the President of the United States, at least the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] has acted in consonance with the President of the United States, after consuming three days' time of the Senate debating about beer, in having withdrawn the amendment.

What kind of folderol would it be to come here with another beer amendment now, after the Senator has withdrawn one which has taken the time of the Senate for three or four days? Would a man now undertake to try to make the people of this country believe that the party offering such a thing as that acted sincerely at all, when they have taken up all this time of the Congress, and, after debating the question ad libitum for three or four days, shoving everything else out of the way, trying to put a beer bill onto a bank bill? Now, after having surrendered, "flown the coop," withdrawn the advocacy of two years, the Senator says he has the idea that he may come back again after the President has made his pronouncement and offer this beer bill again?

What kind of leadership have we beer advocates here if we are going to be left in this way? Certainly some of us would have had an amendment of our own if we had known the Senator from Connecticut would withdraw from the fight. If I had had a bill here under similar circumstances, with the whole Nation leaning on my words, in the thirst that has come, with lips just waiting for it, I would have carried on. But now, behold, the leader of the army has fled, and there is no beer here, and no beer near here, nor any beer that can be near here during this session of the Congress. [Laughter.]

THE POSTPONEMENT OF THE GENEVA DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE—THE CALCULATED INJURY TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, there have been suggestions in the addresses just closed that the Senate is on the eve of an adjournment. The intimations are that such measures as will come before us will quite occupy the time that is left us.

I want the liberty at this moment to bring to the attention of the Senate an international situation which ought not to escape its consideration. I feel that whatever urgency there may be in the affairs of the Senate looking to the close of the legislation resting upon us, we ought not to be oblivious to the surrounding conditions of international feature greatly imperiling the prospect both of the peace and of the prosperity of the United States. We should not present to the country at large an aspect that we can become so absorbed in matters of minor importance, aggregating, it may be, in number and multiplying themselves in the march of the procession, to the degree that we will be wholly blind to what we owe to the Chief Executive of our country, to what we owe to the legislative body—this Senate—and what we owe to the people of our country.

A sense of protection that is due America ought ever to be expressed whenever the necessity arises, and in no place may that be looked for with greater propriety than here in this deliberative body.

On yesterday we listened to a notable address from an eminent colleague. I refer to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], as our personal association since almost our boyhood—coming to the bar together in the West—enforces upon me a degree of affection and regard, as well as a very high esteem of his views, personal or impersonal.

The Senator brought to our attention that the financial situation of America was of a nature that unless something were done to prevent these constant modulations and undulations of the world that were greatly affecting the rise and fall in the prices of commodities, or the value of the currencies of the countries, particularly that of the United States, a possible chaos would be the result. Sir, let me say that it is to avoid that threat of danger, as I see it, that I bring to the attention of the Senate one or two present working international conditions which I feel have produced a result which is about to impale us upon very serious consequences.

Mr. President, I rose to bring to the attention of the Senate an announcement of European public news of this morning. We observe that, after several months, a meeting for disarmament at Geneva, in which we, the United States, have representatives, is now announced as a failure. With that announcement comes the statement that there will be a reassembly in the fall. This is but an excuse for not announcing at this time the concluding views, or decided action, if there be any, on the part of these eminent gentlemen who represent the different countries as delegates to that convention.

Mr. President, the President of the United States, as the representative of a people looking for peace, a great Republic that leads toward the body of world harmony, says that this gathering at Geneva, having been given out as being the last of seven such assemblages, would reach results and pronouncements and in the promulgation giving some encouragement to mankind, to those who are looking for peace by honorable and communal relations between nations. The President assumed to join in it and offered to the American public his reasons, and in pursuit we sent delegates to attend in obedience to the suggestion.

Mr. President, I beg to call to your attention that the real reason for this diplomatic fiasco at Geneva, to be resumed in some form of a renewed siege at Lausanne, is a deliberate and constructive arrangement to injure the prospects of the United States. We have the announcement that in the fall there will be some form of revival. The object is to avoid any impression of what is their intention either to reduce the armament on the one hand or to attempt to avoid a conflict between the nations where a conflict is possible on the other hand. One would assume that this aspect is intended only for the foreign lands. Mr. President, let us speak to the truth. We are told in Holy Writ that a mere shepherd in Israel dared say to the king, "Thou art the man." Mr. President, it was not only because evidences of this Nation, such as shown by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and those speaking in line with the similar subject, that threatened the United States with precipitation of the loss of its gold-standard position on the one hand or the complete depression of its credit before the world as to destroy in the world of finance its position as the first power on the other. But these eminent masters of European policy have concluded that by taking no result and pronouncing, if you please, no decision, they will trick the United States again into the position where it shall be uncertain in all its public action. From the situation they present of dangers and threats to show that there is a prospect of world peace. There is therefore nothing to assure the coming reduction of expenses in these multiplied armaments, and also there is nothing to come forth from these nations that looks to the reduction of the expenses of government by release of debts for war organization.

After all, each one of these countries or all are looking forward to a conflict with our Nation. They are anxious to keep us financially to where we dare not send forth our credits to the world because of the need we will have for its use here in America. Second, they will keep us in such a situation of assumed expense and such multiplied burdens of debt that it will become impossible for the United States to rejuvenate itself in commerce and to extend its commerce to the foreign lands that may seek to be supplied. The real purpose is to drive us to where the financier, feeling the uncertainty of the situation, the business man without any form of stability, will hesitate to extend his money in financing, on the one hand, his business or undertaking. The result will be that in America there will be that tremulous, constant agitation and instability as will lead us to where we will have no direct course of action in behalf of our own people. These eminent gentlemen, master delegates, are being stimulated by the financial interests of Europe which have borrowed such vast sums of money from the United States to now disclose the proposition boldly that they are ready to offer to Germany to withhold from Germany all demands for obligations and exempt her from debts, but only upon the condition, soon to be presented to us, that we relinquish all debts upon these lands who propose or suggest the possibility of relinquishing all debts due to them from Germany.

The real purpose of the present situation, which we have not paused to consider, is to place us in a position before the world where, if yielding to the cancellation or abrogation of debt, we yield a certain share of revenue that is anticipated to the Nation that would lessen her obligation of taxes and obligation of burdens upon her citizens. Second, it would lessen the opportunity of money to be employed in the undertaking of giving employment to citizens.

The final is to leave the matter of disarmament in such shape where Japan finds herself at direct variance with France, where France finds herself at opposition and in contrast and in contest with England. To leave us where the countries will put us before the world as being a nation so situated in embarrassment that no one can tell what step we will take. They will insist we are neither a member of the League of Nations, on the one hand, and have only the position of an observer of the conference on the other. The theory, very clearly, of these projectors of confusion is to adjourn all proceedings under such circumstances as to leave us in such condition that will lessen the credit of the United States before the world in every form and then will force us to the conclusion that in order to obtain money to put our peoples at employment, on the one hand, or, sir, to give strength to the credit of those who possess that they may lend money out in advancement of commerce on the other, we will have to make the demanded concessions these European masters demand along the lines of their demands. Now, to leave us with the statement that nothing shall be done until after the fall is one of those subtle, insidious inducements to each political party practically saying "which of you gentlemen shall do the more in carrying out the suggestions we have to make as will come on in the fall—you will have the more to gain from us"; and thus do they appeal directly to the American political campaign. They advance these insidious suggestions both to the President of the United States as well as his opposing party for the object of having them both offer some form of dealing by which those master imperialist managers in Europe can assure those who may be in partnership, association, or in commingling position with them that they have the United States at last pledged; that they have been assured by an understanding from Republican managers of their great party and the Democratic managers of their great party that they are going to do the kind of things that these masters seek which will relieve them from all debts and insure the rise of the prices of their foreign bonds for speculation before the world to draw the cash out of the different coffers of the world, particularly the United States, and to leave us pauperized by the action.

If you doubt, sir, in your own good sense that these views of mine have foundation, look you this morning and see that for the first time in three and one-half months foreign bonds have risen higher than they have been at any time since we have been sitting here, and risen higher proportionately than all American bonds for the first time since this unhappy devastation that we call depression has set upon America. Is it possible that gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber, such as I see around me, bankers learned in their profession, statesmen conscientious in their patriotism, shall consider with indifference such a situation as surrounds us now?

This is the time when this honorable body, the Senate, in some form should give notice to these world nations that they may play with art of trickery among themselves and use deception there as they choose, but that we behold their purpose and understand their object; that it is no purpose of ours to yield to it; that this is a trick now advanced for the seventh time out of seven, a fulfillment indeed of the scriptural limitation—the seventh failure of the seventh call. So out of the international meets, of which there shall come no announcement and no intention to make announcement of any result, there shall be nothing to indicate that they desire a world peace, and no expression of appreciation of entrance upon the effort. They leave the President of the United States flouted before the world. It is time the United States Senate should say, "This is the end, gentlemen. You have done this deed of deception—or folly—too often." The policy of the United States hereafter shall be, first, to take such steps touching her finances as shall be that which shall revive and renovate America. Second, we shall pursue such course in commerce as shall cause the employment of the vast millions who now are needed for that which is the sustenance of life. Third, we shall look to the world in our own manner for such peace as might be agreed upon, and in such way as we feel would be reliable. We will be no longer the subject of a trick upon the credulity of Christian humanity; and, lastly, with the open statement that we propose now, sir, to proceed with our political elections, with our own measures, with our own policies. It is time we cry out that we Americans shall do the thing along the line of that which we feel will achieve the purpose of our own country in completeness that she may by her example lead mankind to follow her example of honesty to nations and fidelity to the people. The hour has come when the United States of America should announce to the nations of the world the detection of their hypocrisy and trickery before the earth, both in the matter of peace and provision of friendship to the United States. The hour is now for us to proclaim and behold the new and independent future of the United States.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its complimentary audience.

RETURN OF UNRATIFIED TREATIES TO STATE DEPARTMENT

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to submit a resolution directing the Secretary of the Senate to transmit to the Secretary of State, to be deposited in the archives of the State Department, certain conventions and treaties therein named heretofore transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States and not definitely acted upon. The resolution, Mr. President, covers a number of treaties running from 1859 to 1903 which have been transmitted to the Senate but which have not been acted upon and which the State Department desires to have returned, to be placed in its archives and to be kept for historical purposes. In other words, they are treaties which have become obsolete by reason of inaction, and it is simply desired to have them in a place where historically they may be preserved. I offer the resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 268), as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Idaho?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hope the resolution submitted by the Senator from Idaho does not provide for sending back to the State Department the safety-at-sea treaty and the Canadian salmon treaty?

Mr. BORAH. There is nothing in this resolution providing for transmitting to the State Department any treaty sent to the Senate later than 1903.

Mr. COPELAND. I hope there will not be such delay on the other treaties as that they will finally be returned to the State Department.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator from New York in that expression.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Idaho.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. In connection with the resolution just adopted I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the Under Secretary of State.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 6, 1932.

The Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate.

SIR: It is supposed that certain treaties between the United States and foreign powers which from time to time were submitted by the President to the Senate but not definitely disposed of by that body may be among the archives of the committee of which you are chairman. A list of such treaties, none of which, as you will observe, is dated later than 1903, is herewith inclosed.

All of these treaties are of course long since obsolete. Many of them are of interest to students of American history and it would be desirable if the original documents could be in the archives of the department.

Accordingly, I suggest that you cause an examination to be made on this subject and to take into consideration the expediency of moving for the return of the instruments under reference to this department.

I may say that a somewhat similar request was made by Secretary of State Hamilton Fish to Senator Simon Cameron, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, under date of February 9, 1876. Following that request the Senate, on February 14, 1876, passed a resolution in the following terms (list of treaties omitted):

"Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to transmit to the Secretary of State, to be deposited with the archives of the State Department, the following conventions and treaty, heretofore transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States, and not definitely acted on."

Very truly yours,

W. R. CASTLE, Acting Secretary.

Inclosure: List of treaties.

HOME-LOAN BANKS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a few of the many letters and telegrams I have received from farm leaders and others residing in Kansas, urging favorable action by the Senate upon the Goldsborough bill to direct the Federal Reserve Board to use all its powers to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar. The measure as it came from the House also carried a provision, intended to meet a present emergency, directing the board to attempt to stabilize the dollar at the average commodity price level of the period 1921–1929. The Senate Banking and Currency Committee, I am sorry to say, amended the measure so as to take away some of its effectiveness, simply giving the Federal reserve system more power without direction how it shall be used.

However, Mr. President, I am going to support the amendment to which I have just referred, now offered by the Senator from Idaho, to the pending bill. I would much prefer to have a chance to vote on the Goldsborough bill as it came from the House. To me it is fundamentally sound and proposes to do something that will count far more in the present emergency, and in the future, than will the provisions of the amendment as offered by the Senator from Idaho.

The Goldsborough bill directs the Federal Reserve Board to use its powers to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar, and, in addition, it directs the board to use those powers now to effect a controlled expansion of the currency. The amendment, written by the Senator from Virginia, reported by the Banking and Currency Committee, and now offered by the Senator from Idaho as an amendment to the pending home loan bank bill, is, in my judgment, much weaker. But it is a step in the right direction, and I am supporting it in lieu of what I regard as the more effective method.

In my judgment, it is of the highest importance that the Congress should exercise such powers as it has under the Constitution to deflate the dollar. Agriculture, labor, industry, commerce, wages, commodity values generally—all have been deflated. Only the dollar and debts, and to a large degree taxes, have not been deflated.

If we force a reasonable and controlled currency and credit inflation, which, in my judgment, can be accomplished through the Federal Reserve Board, the immediate effect will be to deflate the dollar and give us a dollar with a constantly dependable purchasing power. That will result in a deflation also of debts and taxes. I believe it will result in a rise in farm and other commodity prices; such a rise in commodity prices must come before we can hope for an upturn in business, before we can hope for the return of millions of unemployed to the ranks of wage earners. Mr. President, I am aware of the dangers of inflation, but we are going deeper and deeper in the abyss of deflation.

This country needs more dollars, more credit, more confidence, more dollars at work, and more men at work.

The opening wedge to the return of prosperity under present conditions is more dollars in circulation. Call it inflation, call it reflation, call it stabilization—the need is the same, more money in circulation.

More dollars in circulation will mean an expansion of credit even more important than the expansion of the currency. More important than all, it will mean a return of public confidence in the future of the country. Then the dollars now in hiding will come out into the open and go to work.

When the dollars go to work basic commodity prices will rise. Then the men will go to work.

When the dollars and the men go to work we will have purchasing power for the products of farm and mine and factory; loading for our railroads; business for our merchants; even more business for our bankers, who now are the worst offenders through hoarding of hundreds of millions of money sadly needed by the productive elements of our civilization.

Deflation such as we have been going through penalizes the producing, employing, and working elements of the community for the benefit of the unproductive elements—the money lenders.

We need a permanent monetary policy of the Federal Government. That policy is to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar.

We need more dollars now. We need "honest dollars" instead of "rubber dollars" for future permanent prosperity.

I just want to reiterate my position that this Congress should exercise its responsibility under the Constitution to regulate the value of money and consider something like the Goldsborough bill to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar and should do it before adjournment.

Let me say again, as I have said to the Senate many times, that we can not have a return of prosperity until the prices of farm commodities and other basic commodities go up. And the situation is too serious for Congress to sit back and wait for basic commodity prices to rise, when Congress has the power and the duty, under the Constitution, to assist in bringing that very necessary result.

I send to the desk the letters and telegrams to which I have referred, with the request that they be printed by unanimous consent in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters and telegrams are as follows:

KANSAS STATE FARM BUREAU,
Manhattan, Kans., June 28, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: Our farmers are in a very nervous state of mind. I think I have heard more of them express themselves during the last month as impatient that Congress does not either do something or quit and come home than I have ever heard in the same length of time before. They feel that entirely too much stress is being placed on the idea of balancing the Budget and too little on the problem of bringing about real relief for the distressed conditions.

I am going to make bold to suggest that our Kansas delegation should do everything possible to put through the composite farm relief bill, S. 4536, and the Goldsborough bill for money stabilization. I am also suggesting that fairly liberal treatment for agencies in charge of the agricultural marketing act be urged.

I attended the feeders' day meeting to-day. There was a big crowd present. Most of the talk I heard centered not around methods of feeding cattle but what might be done to relieve the distressed economic situation.

I fully realize that you are up against a very difficult problem and sympathize with you in that. I am satisfied, however, that the suggestions I have outlined will more nearly meet the general idea that I hear expressed by farmers and business men all over the State than anything else.

Yours very truly,

RALPH SNYDER, President.

TOPEKA, KANS., July 3, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

With wheat selling at 15 to 20 cents and other farm prices at similarly low levels, disaster threatens the greatest industry of the Nation. Your appeal for favorable action on pending farm-relief measures before Congress adjourns is most commendable. There is desperate need for legislation that will increase farm prices, and it is our hope your efforts in this direction will be successful.

J. H. MERCER.

SALINA, KANS., July 6, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

It is up to Republican Party to pass emergency-allotment plan or Goldsborough bill. No legislation has been passed in this session to give direct and very little giving indirect help to agriculture. Emergency treatment has been given to banking, utilities, and business. If all we get from this Congress is promise to give emergency in next session, we will be loser. About all agriculture has received is conversational relief. This Congress should not adjourn until emergency legislation is passed that will give farmers money on the barrel head instead of conversation. If Hoover does not force through Goldsborough bill and dollar is not deflated before election, there is trouble ahead.

R. J. LAUBENGAYER.

CONCORDIA, KANS., June 25, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I read your letter in Kansas Farmer for this week, and want to tell you that you have hit the nail square on the head, as the old saying goes.

That last paragraph, in which you say, "To direct the Federal Reserve Board by law to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar at approximately the 1926 level. What this country needs is a 100-cent dollar that will stay honest, is pure common sense."

* * * * * * *

There is no time to waste, and the quicker you can get action on it the better it will be for the millions of people concerned. Something has to be done or the whole country will be in bankruptcy as the producers are at the present time.

I know that there is a growing sentiment among the people that this depression could be overcome through the Federal reserve system if they were compelled to change things. * * *

Sincerely yours,

RAYMOND A. HANSON.

WHEATON, KANS., June 25, 1932.

Hon. Senator CAPPER, Washington.

DEAR SIR: Hundreds of farmers in this part have talked and thought inflation for two months as the only means of saving them. * * * If they don't make this dollar more honest, there's a lot of them will find themselves in same fix, and we can't hang on forever. We have paid our interest and taxes up until this time, but now we have failed to make the interest on the farm, and they gave us 30 days to pay the taxes. We could sell every animal on this farm and not make it. Can't they do something? As I said, there are hundreds of us that are trying to save our homes.

Yours truly,

Mrs. MARGARET CLARK.

THE AMORTIBANC INVESTMENT CO.,
Wichita, Kans., June 21, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It cost three and a half billion bushels of wheat each year to run the Government five years ago. Now it costs 16,000,000,000 bushels of wheat a year at the price at the country market. Five years ago it cost 9,000 bushels of wheat to pay a Congressman. Now it costs 40,000 bushels of wheat. You have been back there a long time. Are many Congressmen worth 40,000 bushels of wheat a year?

The bankers are saying, "The country is fundamentally sound," while they know it is gradually going broke, and that only the subsidy from the Reconstruction Corporation has delayed the announcement of the receivership for many banks * * *.

* * * The dollar was formerly a happy medium of exchange. When it takes 25 pounds of cotton or 4 bushels of wheat or 12 dozen eggs or 40 pounds of pork or 16 pounds of copper to buy a dollar, the tail not only is wagging the dog but it is stopping the dog's progress, and the dollar can no longer be deemed a medium of exchange. Either it should be trimmed down to where it can accelerate trade and commerce again instead of hampering it or the Government expenses should be trimmed 75 per cent in line with commodities.

How long are you boys going to play along back there, quibbling over 10 per cent reductions and trying to cure a credit-sick country with further attempts to expand credit and further subsidies to financial organizations, when everything is cheap except the dollar, "whose integrity has been preserved," and when the only thing that has stood up is Government appropriations?

Yours truly,

R. H. GARVEY.

LARNED, KANS., June 27, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: * * * Frankly, Mr. CAPPER, unless something is done to relieve the condition, the people are going to turn to revolution if the threats we hear every day are sincere. Such a means will only make conditions worse. People are losing confidence in national leaders. I personally hope and believe every leader realizes the grave situation and would like to help better conditions to return. The thing the world bows down to and calls money evidently is responsible for most of the trouble.

Is there not some way to shrink the debts in proportion to the lowering of values? Why should a mortgage on a piece of land remain at 100 per cent when the land is worth only 50 per cent of the 1926 value? It seems to me that a proration of debts to values would have to only be talked of to restore a lot of confidence. If the loaning class thought they were going to have to bear a proration, they would become bulls in confidence instead of bears as they are now. There is no logic in forcing a person to liquidate several times the amount of property to pay a loan. Shrink the loans in proportion to the values and we will all be on the same basis with a much better chance of paying loans and interest charges. Unless a more stable balance is soon made, the loans will never be paid and the chaotic condition will grow worse. It is pretty hard to make most people see how a cloudburst of money on a gullied hillside can do any good unless the channels that drained away the previous deluge are restricted and checked a bit.

Yours very truly,

H. C. COLGLAZIER.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think I heard the Senator from Kansas say that what we want is credit, currency, and confidence. I think we ought to add another word to this alliteration, and that is circulation; yes, and courage, as a Senator sitting near me suggests. However, I can not for the life of me see how the measure is going to put any more money in circulation. As I see it, what will happen will be that the banks now having Federal reserve notes will take them back, get the credit for them, issue the new currency, according to the plan now proposed, and there will be in the banks practically the same amount of money that we have to-day. After it is there, how are the people to get it? How is it to be put in circulation?

Mr. President, without going into any detail—it would not be worth while from my lips—I am as confident as I can be of anything that this bill has in it no hope of any degree of help to our existing economic distress; and it seems to me a futile waste of time for us to be giving consideration to this measure while, on the other hand, we have here pending, at the present moment, though in an emasculated form, a home loan bank bill which has in it the possibility of the relief of the suffering of thousands of home owners who are now in distress because of the foreclosure or the threatened foreclosure of their mortgages. I wish for my part, Mr. President, that we could return to the discussion of a measure which is of such vital concern to the people instead of spending our time in speculation over a proposal which has in it very little prospect of any benefit whatever to the American people.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay action on the pending bill; I should like to see it speeded as rapidly as possible to a final vote, but there is pending here an amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] which I think has great merit and which I think, if adopted, ought to strengthen rather than harm the bill or interfere with its prospect of passage.

The question of the expansion of currency and credit is of very great importance and has a direct bearing on the matters involved in the pending legislation. Financial conditions and the financial situation generally have a bearing on the question of the ownership and making financial arrangements for the building of homes and that sort of thing.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho does not contemplate any undue or improper or questionable inflation. If it does anything at all, it is in the line of reflation; the thing accomplished by it would be to halt, in a measure, the deflation that has been going on and to put some brakes both on the liquidation and the deflation which have been in process ever since the fall of 1929. Those who engineered that great debacle in Wall Street in connection with the stock-exchange speculation and gambling that took place there in 1928 and 1929 through combination, cooperation, and, in some instances, collusion between great bankers and their affiliates and brokers in New York, or exchanges of similar nature, are themselves responsible, to a large degree, for the deflation which took place; and they are now, as I gather from their expressions, doing their best to put a check on deflation and to stop the liquidation which is taking place and which is causing the monstrous decline in prices and the fearful destruction of values generally. They would like, as I understand, to see that movement checked. Of course, the people of the country are suffering by reason of what has taken place and by reason of the policy of deflation; and, while this measure would not, in my judgment, accomplish what the Goldsborough bill would accomplish, it would have some effect in that direction. It would, as I say, check to some extent deflation and bring about reflation and halt the liquidation which is taking place all over the country and which is causing an immense amount of financial distress.

It would increase circulation to the amount of about a billion dollars. That is not a very large sum. There are said to be in circulation something like $6,500,000,000, but a good deal of that is hoarded. This $1,000,000,000 increase in circulation would not equal the amount of money that is now not in circulation, although it is charged up to circulation, but which is withdrawn from circulation and put away, hoarded, in some instances, perhaps, by the banks themselves, and certainly to a large extent by individuals throughout the country.

The Goldsborough bill, being House bill 11499, passed the House almost unanimously, there being very few votes against it, as I recall, after quite extensive hearings, and those hearings have been repeated from time to time. The subject involved in that bill has been under consideration by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives for some 10 or 11 years. Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH especially has given great study and attention to the subject, and there is every reason to believe that sound economic principles underlie that bill which if put into effect would very largely relieve our financial situation.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I understood the Senator to begin his remarks by saying that it might change the complexion of some of the votes on the other side if this amendment were attached or appended to the home loan bank bill; that is to say, that there would be a more friendly feeling for it if the amendment were adopted as a part of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it would, of course, strengthen the bill.

Mr. WATSON. I have not the right and, of course, I have no desire to ask the Senator a direct ad hominem question, but will the Senator vote for the bill if this amendment shall be added to it?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think I will.

Mr. WATSON. That is a vote made out of the whole cloth, and I thank the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not like to commit myself as yet, because I do not know what is going to be put in the bill. The bill has been changed very extensively even since we began to consider it.

Mr. WATSON. And very frequently.

Mr. FLETCHER. And very frequently, so that I do not know just what is going to be added to it, but I will say to the Senator that I am not inclined to throw any obstacles in the way of this proposed legislation and never have been. When the pending bill came over from the House and was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, a special committee was appointed. That committee held hearings on the subject embracing several volumes. I was disposed to be in sympathy with the whole idea and plan and purpose. I was not on the subcommittee; I did not attend the hearings; and I was told after inquiring from time to time about the progress of the bill that it would probably be changed in many respects and that there would be many amendments offered to the Senator's bill, known as the Watson bill here, and to the bill as it came over from the House. I tried to keep up with it as well as I could. To my astonishment, after all these hearings were held by the Banking and Currency Subcommittee of the Senate, instead of reporting out the bill with amendments, or anything of that sort, they simply contented themselves with reporting the House bill just as it was.

I presume that was done for the purpose of speeding action, for fear that a bill amended here might not meet with favor in the House and a long conference would be involved, so the committee concluded to report the House bill and made no report at all on the Watson bill. Practically no amendments were suggested.

If I had been disposed to interfere and oppose the legislation, I could easily enough have held it up in the committee. I do not think the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate considered the report of the subcommittee 30 minutes. It was simply rushed right through. I threw no obstacles in the way. I did not like the bill as it came from the House for several reasons, and I thought certain features in it ought to be changed. We did not take time to do that. I could easily enough have taken time to do that if I had desired to obstruct or to oppose the legislation in any way.

So I have been in sympathy with the general idea, but I do not want to commit myself to the provisions of the bill before I know what they are going to be. I hesitate to do that. I can only say that I am not disposed to block it or interpose any objections to an early conclusion with reference to it.

I think this amendment would add to the bill, because, as I say, its purpose is to bring about a financial condition that would be helpful to the carrying out of the policies of the bill, to bring about some expansion of currency and credit which would be helpful in any constructive undertaking.

Reference has been made to the Goldsborough bill, H. R. 11499, and some people have said—people who are experts, perhaps even more than that, trained students of economical problems—that they do not understand the bill; that it is Greek to them.

I see nothing at all that is complicated in the bill. It is very brief, and just what it does mean is very clear and very plain. It is based upon the opinions of those who have been students of the subject for a great many years.

The hearings in the House show that the bill was favored there. The hearings on the subject in the Senate are quite extensive, too; but I happen to have here the hearings in the House, where Edward A. O'Neal, the president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, favored the bill; Henry A. Wallace, of Des Moines, Iowa, author and writer and student of this subject; Charles R. White, president of the New York Farm Bureau Federation; Charles E. Hearst, president of the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation; L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange; John A. Simpson, national president Farmers' Union; Hon. Robert L. Owen, former Senator from Oklahoma; Dr. Willford I. King, professor of economics, New York University; Ethelbert Stewart, United States Commissioner of Labor Statistics. This bill, by the way, is based upon the report and findings of the Bureau of Labor Statistics after examining the price levels of 744 commodities, showing that that bureau is well equipped to furnish the data upon which the price level would be based. It is a bureau which has the highest commendation; and it is virtually impossible to find a better price index than that of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Then Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, and Mr. George Shipley and others testified, favoring this legislation and giving their arguments and their reasons for it.

The proposition is a very simple one. After reading the House hearings—and I endeavored to keep up with them as well as I could while they were going on—I was favorably impressed with the idea, and introduced in the Senate myself, on April 19, a bill (S. 4429) entitled "A bill to restore and maintain the average purchasing power of the dollar by the expansion and contraction of credits and currency, and for other purposes." It is a very simple and perfectly plain and clear proposition, it seems to me, and is very brief. I will read it:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale commodity markets for the year 1926—shall be restored and maintained by the expansion and contraction of credits and currency through the powers of the United States and its agencies.

Which is an average between 1922 and 1929—

SEC. 2. The Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Secretary of the Treasury are hereby charged with the duty of making effective this policy.

SEC. 3. To enable the Federal reserve banks to achieve this end they are hereby given the right to receive, and the Federal reserve agents are directed to deliver, Federal reserve notes at par for United States obligations deposited as security therefor.

That is all of it. The bill does not confer any extraordinary power on the Federal Reserve Board. It is not anything new. As a matter of fact, the Federal Reserve Board are doing precisely that to-day, and have been for several months past, ever since the Goldsborough bill passed the House—going into the open market and purchasing bonds—and that money has gone out into circulation. I think they have purchased some $700,000,000, or maybe a little more. They are doing precisely what this bill contemplates. They are doing it for the very purpose of accomplishing the thought in this bill—that is, to increase circulation, to expand the currency. That is what they are doing it for. The only real change in the law made by these proposals—the Goldsborough bill and my bill—is that we make it the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to do this thing, whereas under the law now it is discretionary with them to do it or not. They can proceed with that policy for this week and this month; they can drop it the next week and the next month. They can indulge in that practice precisely when they wish to do it, and drop it when they wish to drop it. This would make it their duty to go out and buy these bonds until the commodity-price level is raised to the average wholesale-price level of 1926. Then they would discontinue. They would maintain it at that level, and begin again when the price level dropped.

That is a great thing to accomplish, because it is well recognized everywhere that this drop in commodity prices is unprecedented and is causing distress. Professor King said, in an article which I have here, published in the Buroughs Clearing House of April, 1930, at page 16:

> In view of the fact that falling prices are inimical to the welfare of the vast majority of our people, it is not surprising that there is to-day a widespread demand that measures be taken at once to remedy the evil. Prominent officials of the Treasury Department and the Federal reserve system admit readily enough that the price level ought to be raised, but they interpose the question: "How can it be done safely?"

That is conceded everywhere. Take, for instance, our commodity prices. Here is a recent clipping. I have not the exact date, but it is a clipping from a newspaper printed within a month, and it says:

> For the last four weeks the all-commodities' index number, which includes 784 commodities or price series, has fluctuated about two-thirds of 1 per cent around 66. Early in March the general index number leveled off at 66.5 for four weeks.
> Based on the figures of 65.8 for all commodities, the wholesale purchasing power of the dollar is computed at $1.59.
> After rallying last week, the index of farm products again dropped off from 50.1 to 49.7.

That is the index as to the price of farm products, 49.7. The purchasing power of the dollar has gone up to about $1.59. We can not have prosperity in this country with the price level constantly decreasing. What good does it do for a farmer to produce a product, for instance, if he can do it—and they are doing it successfully everywhere—if he can get practically nothing for it, if he can not get the cost of production out of his product?

So that underlying all this situation is the question of a proper financial system. All that this bill, the Goldsborough bill, proposed was to make it the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to do precisely what they are doing now, instead of leaving it wide open to their discretion. They are pursuing this very policy; and there is not any doubt, in my judgment, but that it would be a sound policy, just as has been contended by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH in the House.

Professor King further says in this article:

> The only sure way to raise prices is to increase the supply either of bank deposits subject to check or of money.

I think that is perfectly sound. The article is a very interesting one. The hearings in the House and before our committee on this subject demonstrate clearly the soundness of that proposition.

In the absence of that, however, not being able to vote for that proposal here under this amendment, which is the amendment the Banking and Currency Committee put on the Goldsborough bill, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting this provision, we have to deal with the proposition now submitted by the Senator from Idaho, which is to authorize the issuing of currency against bonds.

As has been stated—and I need not repeat it or dwell upon it—that would mean an increase in circulation and an expansion of the currency to the amount of about $1,000,000,000, which in itself would not be as much as is now being hoarded in this country. That would be helpful, I think; and, therefore, I am strongly in favor of that, although I would rather vote straight out for the Goldsborough bill, or the bill as I have it here, which is practically the same in principle.

Mr. President, this country is suffering from this deflation, the liquidation that has been going on. The Banking and Currency Committee has been investigating some of the underlying causes for that, including the operations on the New York Stock Exchange. It is perfectly amazing what has taken place there. The evidence shows that bankers, officers of the leading banks of the country, the strongest financial institutions of the country, in combination with brokers, dealt in stocks and bonds on the stock exchange, making enormous profits for themselves, and finally unloading them on the public and causing an immense loss to the people of this country. It is estimated that the decrease in the value of securities on the stock exchange in October, 1929, amounted to $29,000,000,000. There was some little effort to stimulate the market, but again in October, 1930, the decrease in the value of securities amounted to $20,000,000,000. There, upon that one exchange, the financial center of this country, there was a depreciation in the value of securities of $49,000,000,000. All the real money in all the world does not amount to over $50,000,000,000, and by the operations on that exchange, under the spirit of gambling and speculation, assisted and encouraged by the brokers, this terrific loss has fallen upon the people of this country.

The effect of that depreciation in securities was to destroy the value of lands and other property, and to interrupt business. Many business men have gone out of business entirely because they became bankrupt, and lost everything on the stock exchange. I hold in my hand a circular issued by Kerr & Co., of San Francisco, Calif., dated October, 1931. The opening statement is as follows:

> The Wall Street panic of 1929 rocked the financial foundations of the world.
> Millions of people lost billions of dollars in the greatest swindlefest of all time.
> Financial racketeering habitually practiced on investors by predatory wealth and the greatest protected gambling hell on earth. The following tabulation shows a few of the 1,286 "safe" securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

The circular goes on to show that the high mark of these stocks was attained in 1929, and it gives the quotations of October, 1931. I have checked the figures recently, as of July 2, and have indicated the changes up to the present time. For instance, the high of American Can in 1929 was $184.50. The low, in October, 1931, was $71.50. On July 2, 1932, it was $33.25.

Vanadium: High, 1929, $116.50; July 2, 1932, $7.

United States Steel: High, 1929, $261.75; in October, 1931, $62.25; on July 2, 1932, $23.75.

Bethlehem Steel: High, 1929, $140.75; October, 1931, $24.25; July 2, 1932, $18.

Midland Steel is not now quoted. It went from $321 in 1929 to $7 in October, 1931.

Kennecott Copper: High, 1929, $104.75; now, $5⅛.

Anaconda Copper: High, 1929, $174.75; now, $3⅛.

On the margin appear these statements:

> United States Steel common, off $1,735,923,514.
> General Motors, off $3,023,250,000.
> Radio, off $1,368,718,000.

I ask that this whole statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WALL STREET PANIC OF 1929 ROCKED THE FINANCIAL FOUNDATIONS OF THE WORLD—MILLIONS OF PEOPLE LOST BILLIONS OF DOLLARS IN THE GREATEST SWINDLEFEST OF ALL TIME

WOLVES OF WALL STREET

Wall Street: The alma mater of mergers—where business men lured by promises of great gain turn over unit concerns to big business—accept stock in mergers and learn a merger is often a mirage—and that they "sold themselves down the river."

The stock exchange is regarded as the greatest protected gambling hell on earth, where it is always open season for suckers. Investors pit their feeble wits against fraudulent propaganda—frenzied market rigging—manipulation—the swindling margin game—ballooned stocks and vicious short selling. Millions of investors lose billions of dollars in a "shell game" that can't be beat.

Depreciation of 1,286 "safe securities" on the New York Stock Exchange from the 1929 high to recent low is reported at $60,000,000,000. The mind can comprehend that only by comparison. If in gold loaded on express cars—12 tons per car—it would make a train 124 miles long. It approximates $31 for every acre of land in the United States—$480 per head of population.

That vast sum of money represents false values squeezed out of "safe securities" on the New York Stock Exchange. It does not include depreciation of stocks on other exchanges, or loss on stock of 1,345 bank failures in 1930 and 932 for the first eight months of 1931.

Financial and corporation racketeers—allied with stock exchanges—investment bankers—thousands of big and little banks—sold at swindling prices—clearly evidenced by present prices—billions of dollars of stocks, "rights," mortgages, bonds, investment-trust shares—as "safe securities." Sedulously promoting stock gambling, taking billions of dollars from legitimate business, and, as a result, the panic followed.

These same interests exchanged billions of dollars for scraps of paper of decadent monarchies, puling republics, and blustering dictatorships, and that bunk and junk were loaded on the American investor and he will later have to pay the allied debts of the World War.

Investors learn financial throat-cutting is an indoor sport of Wall Street—followed by wreck and ruin—panic and unemployment—a long, long trail of disaster, suicide, and death. That Wall Street politically and financially dominates Government—even Presidents—formulating laws it finds Washington and Congress a convenient branch office.

People are slowly learning that financial and political racketeering dominate governments of the world, where money talks, prints, broadcasts, reigns, and kicks into the gutter parliaments, kingdoms, and republics, buncoing the political peasantry of this and other countries by propaganda, making democracy a farce.

A few years ago Tom Lawson threw a monkeywrench in Wall Street machinery when he called the big boys liars and thieves, and the tricks of the game downright thievery.

The Armstrong Commission resulted from the Lawson exposé. Hughes, the present Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, head of the commission, made the big boys "cough up" and reform. Some fled the country as frightened rats desert a sinking ship. History shows what happened to some of the crooks.

Demand of the next Congress an "Armstrong" investigation of the stock exchange. Demand of your Senator and Representative legislation that will make felons of the wolves of Wall Street. Had this been done years ago there would have been no panic. And the millions now unemployed would have jobs, shelter, and food.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there has been a gradual decline since, and with that decline there has been a decline in commodity prices. The average of the listed stocks was $176.75 in 1929, and the low in October, 1931, was $30.32. I have not figured out what the average low would be to-day, but it is lower than that.

There has been a continuation of this depreciation in values. Those are the kinds of stock which the financiers unloaded on the public, and the public have suffered these losses. We have to do something about it. It is a situation which is intolerable, and we can do something in the direction of expanding the currency and credit in order to supply the necessary funds with which to carry on our business.

For these reasons I am going to support the amendment, and then I will have an amendment to offer a little later myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] desires to be present before this amendment is voted on, so I shall have to call for a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Reed
Austin	Dale	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Dickinson	Kean	Schall
Bingham	Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Black	Fess	Keyes	Shipstead

Bratton	George	Lewis	Smoot
Brookhart	Glass	Long	Steiwer
Broussard	Glenn	McGill	Stephens
Bulkley	Goldsborough	McKellar	Thomas, Idaho
Bulow	Gore	McNary	Townsend
Byrnes	Hale	Metcalf	Trammell
Capper	Harrison	Morrison	Tydings
Caraway	Hastings	Moses	Vandenberg
Cohen	Hatfield	Norbeck	Wagner
Connally	Hawes	Norris	Walcott
Coolidge	Hayden	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Hebert	Patterson	Watson
Costigan	Howell	Pittman	White

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, in the nature of a substitute; but before offering it I am going to ask that the pending amendment be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Idaho moves to insert, on page 39, after line 19:

That notwithstanding any provisions of law prohibiting bonds of the United States from bearing the circulation privilege, for a period of five years from the date of enactment of this act all outstanding bonds of the United States heretofore issued or issued during such period bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3⅜ per cent per annum shall be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issuance of circulating notes to national-banking associations, and upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States by a national-banking association of any such bonds, such association shall be entitled to receive circulating notes in the same manner and to the same extent and subject to the same conditions and limitations now provided by law in the case of 2 per cent gold bonds of the United States bearing the circulation privilege; except that the limitation contained in section 9 of the act of July 12, 1882, as amended, with respect to the amount of lawful money which may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States by national-banking associations for the purpose of withdrawing bonds held as security for their circulating notes, shall not apply to the bonds of the United States to which the circulation privilege is extended by this section and which are held as security for such notes. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to modify, amend, or repeal any law relating to bonds of the United States which now bear the circulation privilege.

As used in this section, the word "bonds" shall not include notes, certificates, or bills issued by the United States.

There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment in the nature of a substitute and ask that it be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Wisconsin offers the following amendment in the nature of a substitute:

That paragraph "eighth" of section 4 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is amended by adding before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That notwithstanding any provisions of law prohibiting bonds of the United States from bearing the circulation privilege, for a period of five years from the date this paragraph, as amended, takes effect, all outstanding bonds of the United States heretofore issued or issued during such period and bearing a rate of interest of 3⅜ per cent or less shall be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes to Federal reserve banks, and upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States by a Federal reserve bank of any such bonds, such bank shall be entitled to receive circulating notes in the same manner and to the same extent and subject to the same conditions and limitations as now provided by law; except that the total amount of such circulating notes issued by the Comptroller of the Currency to any Federal reserve bank shall not exceed the amount of the paid-in capital stock and surplus of the national banking associations within the district of such Federal reserve bank, less an amount equal to the circulating notes of all national banking associations within such district which are outstanding upon the date this paragraph, as amended, takes effect. Nothing contained in this paragraph, as amended, shall be construed to modify, amend, or repeal any law relating to bonds of the United States which bear the circulation privilege on the date this paragraph, as amended, takes effect."

As used in this section, the word "bonds" shall not include notes, certificates, or bills issued by the United States.

There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. REED. This in effect would abrogate the 40 per cent gold-coverage requirement of the Federal reserve notes at the present time, would it not?

Mr. BLAINE. That is not the way the proposition should be stated. This substitute amends section 4, paragraph 8, of the Federal reserve act, which reads as follows:

Upon deposit with the Treasurer of the United States of any bonds of the United States in the manner provided by existing law relating to national banks, to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes in blank registered and countersigned as provided by law, equal in amount to the par value of the bonds so deposited, such notes to be issued under the same conditions and provisions of law as with reference to the issue of circulating notes of national banks secured by bonds of the United States bearing the circulating privilege, except that the issue of such notes shall not be limited to the capital stock of such Federal reserve banks.

It amends that provision of the Federal reserve act and makes eligible for the circulation privilege all bonds bearing a rate of interest of 3⅜ per cent or less, and limits the issue of circulation to the paid-in capital stock and surplus of the national banks and the member banks of the Federal reserve system, less outstanding national bank notes and outstanding Federal reserve notes.

Mr. REED. Why would not the same result be more directly attained if the Senator were to propose an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho limiting the bonds that are thereby given the circulation privilege to bonds bearing an interest rate of 3⅜ per cent and less? Then the proposal of the Senator from Idaho would be much less harmful, because the bonds that would be given the circulation privilege would be much less in amount. It would not apply at all to the first or fourth Libertys which are now outstanding in such large amounts.

I am in sympathy with the Senator's idea that we ought not to make a Christmas present to the banks, and that is exactly what I think is done by the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho. The Senator from Wisconsin ameliorates that proposition by restricting the circulation privilege to the lower-interest issues of bonds of the United States, and I am in full sympathy with that, but I think he can get the same result more effectively and directly by offering it as an amendment, instead of a substitute, to make the notes national bank notes instead of Federal reserve bank notes.

Mr. BLAINE. But let me point out to the Senator that I am doing more than the Senator has suggested. I am also avoiding an invitation to banks that are not national banks to join the system of national banks in order to have the circulation privilege, by taking away the enormous profits that go to the national banks on the issuance of national bank notes. The result flows from the method I have used. I have proposed to amend the Federal reserve act, specifically section 4, paragraph 8, and if this were adopted then whatever profits are made out of the issue will be governed by section 7 of the Federal reserve act, which provides that there shall be an annual dividend of not more than 6 per cent of the paid-in capital to the stockholders of the Federal reserve bank, and that the surplus over and above that is a franchise tax which goes into the Treasury of the United States. By making that set-up we do not offer an invitation to State banks to join the national banking system. We will not induce State banks to join the national banking system because they will be limited in this undertaking to 6 per cent, which is a very reasonable return, while if the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho is taken as the basis for legislation, the franchise tax does not attach to the profits that are made on the circulation of national bank notes.

Mr. REED. That is quite true. All we would get out of them would be the one-half of 1 per cent circulation tax.

Mr. BLAINE. That is all we would receive, the circulation tax.

I want to present a few statistical facts for the information of the Senate. I called up the Federal Reserve Board, and I found that on December 31, 1931, the most recent report the board has, the total paid-in capital stock and surplus of the 6,368 national banks was, in round numbers, $2,996,000,000. I am omitting the thousands. There were 878 member banks or State banks having a capital stock and surplus of $2,026,000,000 in round numbers. The total of the two is $5,022,000,000. The basis for the circulation of the Federal reserve bank notes is to start with that figure and then deduct therefrom the following items as provided in the substitute:

The national-bank notes, as stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania yesterday, outstanding, and for which there is no cash deposited, $627,000,000. The amount on December 31 last of the Federal-reserve notes was $2,624,000,000; but at the present time that has been increased slightly over $200,000,000. Taking the two figures, the national-bank notes and the existing Federal reserve notes make a total in round numbers of $3,500,000,000. Subtracting that from the total paid-in capital stock and surplus of the member banks and the Federal reserve system makes an available additional circulation of $1,500,000,000.

If we were to discuss this from the standpoint of expanding the currency, of course my substitute offers a greater expansion, but it does the two things which I have pointed out. It protects the low-interest-bearing bonds from depreciation. I invite attention to the fact that on yesterday all United States bonds bearing a rate of interest of 3⅜ per cent sold under par, and some of them sold at a considerable discount, while bonds bearing a rate of interest above 3⅜ per cent were selling above par. The member banks of the Federal reserve system have the lower-interest-bearing bonds in their portfolios. They can send those bonds to the Federal reserve bank in the districts in which the member bank is located, and through the Federal reserve bank they may have Federal reserve bank notes issued against those bonds. Under my proposal there will be no inducement for an appreciation of the premium on bonds, and it will absolutely prevent any depreciation on the lower-interest-bearing bonds. It will not induce State banks to join the national banking system for the privilege of issuing national-bank notes for the reason, as I pointed out, that the incentive, the great profit involved, will not be present. In my opinion it would seem that we are protecting the stability of our bonds, we are assuring against a depreciation of the low-interest-bearing bonds, and as well assuring against a tremendous appreciation in the higher-interest-bearing bonds, which appreciation would not, of course, come into the Treasury of the United States, and we are not interested in boosting the premium on bonds after the Government has parted with those bonds; but I am interested in maintaining the stability of our bonds and also maintaining those bonds at par.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania for a question.

Mr. REED. It occurs to me that the Senator's proposal amounts to a revival and extension of the plan of issuing Federal reserve bank notes as distinguished from Federal reserve notes. The large amount to which the Senator referred as being in circulation, $2,700,000,000, are Federal reserve notes secured at least 40 per cent by gold and the balance by eligible paper or United States securities.

Mr. BLAINE. That is correct.

Mr. REED. The other section of the act which provides for the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes provides for circulating notes very much like national-bank notes, but that section has been gradually falling into disuse; at the present time there are only a couple of million dollars of such bank notes outstanding, and the money has been deposited in the Treasury to redeem them all. It does not seem to me that it is wise policy to revive that system. I think all the Federal reserve currency ought to have the 40 per cent gold coverage and that the other system of issuing notes without gold, merely backed by United States bonds, is unwise, because it creates an inelastic and undesirable form of currency. I defer, however, to the Senator from Virginia, as he knows all about the Federal reserve system while I do not know very much about it.

Mr. BLAINE. May I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that we are confronted with a condition here; we are confronted with the proposition of——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BLAINE. I merely wish to make a few more observations, and then will yield to the Senator from Virginia.

My position is that under the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho we are broadening the field for the issuance of national-bank notes which have no gold back of them but which are backed only by United States bonds. The national banks have availed themselves of the privilege of issuing national-bank notes practically to the full extent, and if we broaden the circulating privilege of bonds or include other bonds and give them the circulating privilege, I am of the opinion that the national banks would seize the opportunity and issue additional bank notes, because they are especially inviting from the standpoint of profit and convenience, and all that sort of thing. I think it has been demonstrated by the testimony before the Committee on Banking and Currency that if authority be granted to issue additional circulating medium of this character it will be found that the large national banks will take advantage of it, and their desire for profits will not result in that circulating medium's filtering back into the various sections of the country, but in going to those sources where the profits will be greatest, and that means the stock market; that means speculation. By increasing the number of banks which may avail themselves of the circulation privilege, we at least scatter the benefits over the country; we give the privilege to 878 State banks of obtaining the benefit of Federal reserve bank notes. Now I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I have had an opportunity only to glance at this proposition and not to consider its details; but it seems to me that the major purpose of the Senator from Wisconsin could readily and instantly be accomplished by accepting the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which had been previously made to me by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], of confining the issuance under the proposed amendment of the Senator from Idaho to outstanding bonds bearing not exceeding 3⅜ per cent interest. That would cover the objection raised as to suggested profits of national banks, which I do not concede is involved, because the national banks now own these bonds and derive the rate of interest, whatever it may be, from their possession. I think the suggestion offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania is feasible, and it is altogether acceptable to me, except that I do not know—and I should be glad if the Senator from Pennsylvania would inform us if he has the information—in what volume these particular bonds are held by the 7,600 national banks of the country and what their distribution is.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield in order that I may reply to the question of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. REED. The total outstanding amount of Treasury bonds bearing 3⅜ per cent interest or less is slightly over $2,900,000,000, or about three times the estimated requirements for the purpose of the Senator from Idaho. How large a number of them is owned by national banks it is difficult to say; but we all remember that the banks got pretty well stuck with the 3 per cent issue which was last put out, and most of them doubtless still have the bonds they took on their original subscriptions.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; the trouble with the suggestion, as I have indicated, is that we do not know here the total amount of these bonds that may be included in the $4,199,000,000 of bonds held by the national banks; we do not know what is their distribution. They all may be held in one or two money centers; and if that be true, the 7,600 national banks throughout the country would not derive much advantage from this proposition.

Furthermore, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin just how it is expected that the notes under this proposal will get into the possession of the individual national banks? As I read his proposed amendment, only Federal reserve banks are authorized to issue these notes, and the Federal reserve banks have no reason to issue them; they have no use for them. The Federal reserve banks have in their portfolios now assets they can not utilize, and which they are only utilizing for the purchase in the open market of United States bonds which they do not need. Just exactly how could 7,600 national banks get possession of these notes?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I rather think the Senator from Virginia is quite familiar with how that is done. Many banks throughout the country can avail themselves of the benefit of the Federal reserve notes.

Mr. GLASS. But these are not Federal reserve notes; these are Federal reserve bank notes.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand that; but let me finish my statement. The banks that belong to the system could avail themselves of the Federal reserve bank notes identically the same as they avail themselves of Federal reserve notes.

Mr. GLASS. No; they get Federal reserve notes by putting up commercial paper.

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly.

Mr. GLASS. They do not get them through the Treasury of the United States; they get them through the agents of the Government at the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand that; I do not believe that I am confused in this proposition. Presently the member banks of the Federal reserve system avail themselves of the benefits of Federal reserve notes by depositing their commercial paper, and, under the Glass-Steagall bill, 60 per cent may be United States bonds. Under my substitute the member banks would do identically the same thing. They would not offer gold, they would offer United States bonds; the Federal reserve system would make application to the Treasury Department, and, in turn, the Treasury Department or the Comptroller of the Currency of the Treasury Department, exactly as the law now provides, would authorize such notes, and in return the Federal reserve bank would credit the member bank.

Mr. GLASS. There is nothing in the Senator's amendment which provides for any such process.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, surely the Senator is mistaken. The present law provides for that procedure.

Mr. GLASS. For the issuance of Federal reserve notes; yes.

Mr. BLAINE. For the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes. Paragraph 8, section 4, of the Federal reserve act provides for that very thing. The members of the Federal reserve system can obtain Federal reserve bank notes now upon the conditions set forth in the law. This is simply extending the privilege of circulation to any United States bond that bears a rate of interest of 3⅜ per cent or less, and the modus operandi in obtaining the circulating medium is identically the same as now set out by law.

Mr. GLASS. It would have to go through the process of the individual bank making application, assembling its commercial paper, and having it passed upon by the Federal reserve bank officials. It would be a very complicated procedure, at best, and if that is to be proposed seriously I would suggest to the Senator from Idaho that he had better withdraw his amendment altogether.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the matter is only complicated by reason of the efforts of the Senator from Virginia to complicate it. He assumed when he began his interrogatories that this could not be done. I have pointed out that it can be done under the present law as to the 2 per cent bonds. My provision merely extends the circulation privilege to bonds having 3⅜ per cent or less instead of limiting the privilege to the 2 per cent bonds. Two per cent bonds are no longer available to any appreciable amount.

Mr. GLASS. It concentrates the matter here in Washington, with the requirement that it go through the present complicated process of presenting commercial paper and having it passed upon by the agents of the Government at the respective Federal reserve banks, whereas under this process it is an application made by the impounding of bonds by each of the individual 7,600 banks. I again suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that his major proposition is covered fully by the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania as to the possible profits that the banks might make, which suggestion is altogether unobjectionable to me, except, as I have said, none of us now knows what is the distribution of these bonds among the individual banks.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho it is estimated there will be an increase in circulation and expansion of the currency to the extent of about $1,000,000,000. Does the Senator's substitute have the effect of reducing that amount?

Mr. BLAINE. No; my substitute would permit additional circulating currency to the extent of about $1,500,000,000, a little under $1,500,000,000. I have not the exact figures, but it would run to $1,450,000,000, at least.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator's point is well taken that the amendment of the Senator from Idaho covering all bonds at any rate of interest is probably too broad. The object, I think, of those who favor this amendment, or anything like it, is to increase the circulating medium, and that is the object the Senator from Wisconsin has in view.

There is not any doubt but that there are enough bonds drawing 3⅜ per cent interest or less to much more than cover the applications that could be made if all the banks applied for everything they were entitled to in the way of bonds. I think it would be conceded, too, that under existing law 2 per cent interest is not sufficiently attractive to cause the banks to apply for this increased circulation, because a large number of them do not do it. So that rate must be increased, and we must put it at a point where it will be profitable. After all, the object to be attained is an increased circulation of the currency.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the 2 per cent bonds are exhausted.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. And if a bank attempts to buy them, it must pay, according to the last available data I have very recently, a premium of about 2⅓ per cent, or about 102.

Mr. NORRIS. I think they have been still higher than that.

Mr. BLAINE. So that 2 per cent bonds actually command a premium.

Mr. NORRIS. The point I want to make to the Senator, no matter whether it is his substitute or the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, is this:

Nobody can tell accurately in advance just how high the interest rate on bonds bearing the circulating privilege should be in order to make them sufficiently attractive to bring about this increased circulation. I want to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that he amend his amendment by inserting, on line 9, page 2, after the word "period," these words:

Bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3⅜ per cent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I shall not object to that amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can modify his amendment by himself putting it in, without a formal vote, if he wants to.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. And, of course, we are entitled to vote on that before we vote on the substitute, under the rule.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I propose, by way of perfecting the amendment, to insert after the word "period," in line 9, on page 2 of the amendment, the words:

Bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3⅜ per cent premium.

Mr. BLAINE. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, that amendment accomplishes just one thing, and that is to protect the value of the low-interest-bearing bonds; but it fails to deal with another and very important thing, and that is the enormous profits that national banks can make and do make on account of this circulating privilege. Those profits are not due to the rate of interest on the bonds—not at all.

Take the 2 per cent Panama Canal bonds: The rate of interest on those bonds is only 2 per cent; but as a matter of fact, those bonds sold at a premium, and it took $102.338 to buy a $100 bond. Notwithstanding that premium, the circulating privilege is profitable. A national bank exercising that privilege receives first the interest on the bond, whatever that rate of interest may be. Then it takes 95 per cent of that money, or $95,000 out of every $100,000 it puts up, and it receives all the way from 6 to 12 per cent return on it in ordinary transactions; and when there was a great stock-speculative spirit abroad in the land some of the New York banks and banks in the interior received as high as 20 per cent on their money. So you can make up your minds that if we extend the circulating privilege to these additional bonds, when the time comes, if it does come, that there is an upturn in affairs, and the stocks and bonds of our industries and transportation concerns begin to rise, and there is a speculative spirit created, all of that circulation will immediately be diverted into the stock market, into speculation, and the banks will make an enormous profit from a circulating medium back of which they have an investment of only 5 per cent, the amount that they must deposit in the redemption fund.

Mr. President, the national-bank question was fought out a long, long time ago by Andrew Jackson. I am not going into that political history.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BLAINE. I am not going into that. I simply referred to that in passing.

Mr. GLASS. I should like the Senator to go into it to this extent——

Mr. BLAINE. I prefer to have the Senator speak in his own right. I do not want to be discourteous, Mr. President, but I am not concerned about the political history. Finally, the United States Congress fixed the policy of limiting the circulation privilege of United States bonds to the 2 per cent Panama bonds.

The time was when this privilege extended to bonds drawing 6 per cent and 5 per cent; and eventually it was restricted to bonds drawing only 2 per cent. That policy has been maintained, and it has been maintained for a very good reason.

When the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] wrote the Federal reserve banking law, he saw to it that there were no additional privileges extended to national banks in the issuing of national-bank notes.

The opportunity for profits, of course, will be an inducement to drag into the national-banking system additional banks that are not now members of that system, and finally we will be extending the circulating privilege to all banks—a monetary system which, of course, has been denounced by economists and those who have had any official responsibility respecting a monetary system for America in recent times.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I should like to have the Senator's opinion upon the proposal of making the period 1 year instead of 5, with the privilege of renewal each year for not exceeding 5 years upon the approval of the Federal Reserve Board.

I share the Senator's views in much of what he is saying; but the thought I had was that since the purpose of this is to increase circulation—whether or not that is necessary is in doubt—we do limit the circulation to Federal reserve banks, under the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, to be responsive to the money needs—at some times so much, and at other times less. If that be a correct policy, would it not be better, if this measure becomes law, instead of making the time 5 years, to make it 1 year, with the privilege of renewal each year, not beyond 5 years, upon the approval of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, of course in either case either of these two propositions is a trial proposition. There is no doubt about that. I doubt if it should be limited to one year. I have no objection to making the modification, making it two years and then extending the privilege beyond those two years. Even as a tryout I have no objection to making it two years, without any reference to extension, and on that basis I have no objection to the suggestion.

Mr. FESS. It would appear to me that that is consonant with the method in which we have been proceeding under the Federal reserve act. While I look with askance upon this sort of legislation to a considerable extent, if this is written in I think that limitation ought to be put on.

Mr. BLAINE. I should prefer to leave the extension of the matter to the Congress. I should be very willing to accept the Senator's suggestion to strike out the word "five" where it has reference to the term and insert the word "two." I know it is a trial proposition, and in either case it is to be limited.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. BROOKHART. Under this proposition as amended, nearly three billions of new bonds are made available as a basis for these bank-note issues. Under the Senator's argument of profits, to which I agree so far as that is concerned, would not the banks which are entitled to use these bonds as a basis for these issues acquire them, whether they have them now or not; and would it not lead to an expansion of the currency to the full amount authorized?

Mr. BLAINE. The maximum expansion possible under the proposition I have presented——

Mr. BROOKHART. Under the proposition as amended, as the Senator from Idaho has perfected his amendment, I understood that to be about $3,000,000,000.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know how much the additional circulating medium would be.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Pennsylvania gave the figures.

Mr. BLAINE. Was it $2,900,000,000?

Mr. BORAH. Two billion, seven hundred million dollars, I think.

Mr. BLAINE. The total additional circulation available under the Senator's amendment, as I understand, would be $995,000,000, in round numbers.

Mr. BROOKHART. What is the provision which limits that?

Mr. BLAINE. That is due to the restriction as to the capital stock.

Mr. BROOKHART. Unless new banks come into the system.

Mr. BLAINE. Unless new banks come into the system. Then, of course, it might be quite unlimited.

Mr. BROOKHART. Under the Senator's idea, if the currency could be expanded this full amount, that would have a tendency to lower the rate of interest to the whole public, would it not?

Mr. BLAINE. It would depend upon whether or not the national-bank notes would filter back into the pockets of the people or go into the stock market in speculation. I think if the testimony before the Committee on Banking and Currency were examined closely, it would be disclosed that the tendency is, under such a medium of circulation, for it to find its way, first, into the speculative market rather than back into the pockets of the people, and I think that is correct.

Mr. BROOKHART. That may have been true in the past, but I think the public has lost confidence in this speculation, so that it may be hard to develop again.

Mr. BLAINE. I can not speculate on what the people may think about the future.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator think that a $900,000,000 expansion would amount to much in the restoration of commodity prices?

Mr. BLAINE. A $900,000,000 expansion, if it actually went into the pockets of the people who produce, might have a material influence.

Mr. BROOKHART. In this case it would go into the pockets of the customers of the banks, whether they produce or not.

Mr. BLAINE. It is very evident that even to-day there is an enormous amount of circulating medium that is in the banks, and that medium is not going into the pockets of the people. It is very probable that the banks would use this money for identically the same purpose for which they use the money which is borrowed from the Reconstruction

Finance Corporation, to provide more liquidity for the banks and to retire obligations which the banks owe to other banks.

That is my view of it, Mr. President. I do not care to extend the debate beyond these expressions of my own views.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to offer one observation. It seems to me that if there is any hazard whatever in the pending proposition submitted by the Senator from Idaho it lies in the possible repercussion as a result of its misrepresentation. I am thinking, for example, of the comment in the editorial column of the Washington Post this morning, which is typical of the danger I have in mind. Referring to the proposal as submitted by the Senator from Idaho, and its alleged inflationary characteristics, the editorial says:

> If Congress should approve a scheme for debasement of the currency the people would demand gold for hoarding, and the backbone of the American monetary system would be broken.

The thing I am trying to say is that there is no remote, direct, or indirect characteristic of debasement of the currency in the proposition to which I refer. I think it is, to begin with, an axiom that the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] never would lend himself in any degree to a debasement of the currency. Meanwhile the facts speak for themselves.

Mr. GLASS. It would be as utterly impossible for me to do that as it would for that newspaper to be fair in its comments.

Mr. VANDENEERG. The Senator has used the editorial for a double purpose. I am using it solely for the purpose of typifying the ease with which this type of a thing can be misunderstood, and I am trying to say again that it is emphatically important—and in this I know the Senator from Virginia will agree, and the Senator from Idaho will agree—that it should be unequivocally understood that this is simply an extension of the existing national-bank-currency method, which has been pursued for years and that it has in its purview and lengthened shadow no remote element of debasement of the currency.

Whether or not we agree with the principle of the bill, it is beside the immediate point I am making. If this amendment is agreed to, let it be distinctly understood that it would not debase the currency. It would leave us with the same sound money which we now possess.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I wanted to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin just exactly why State banks would transform themselves into national banks and join the system because of the alleged temptation of the alleged profit to the national banks in bank circulation. If that were true, why do they not transform themselves now? Why have they not done it all along? There are in the United States 17,000 State banks and only 7,600 national banks. If the profit in circulation is so inviting, is so enormous, as the Senator from Wisconsin pronounces, why should not these 17,000 State banks abandon their State charters and go into the national system and participate in these enormous profits which are supposed to be accruing to the national banks?

Mr. President, of course, if the amendment presented by the Senator from Wisconsin should be adopted, the whole purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho would be instantly abrogated. There is not a member bank of the system that would go to the trouble to assemble its commercial paper to be presented to the agent of the Government at a Federal reserve bank for rediscount purposes, to assemble that paper and offer it to a Federal reserve bank for Federal reserve notes. They are not doing that now. The capacity of the Federal reserve banks to respond to the commercial requirements of the country is almost inexhaustible. They can get Federal reserve notes now, Government obligations in the final analysis, by assembling their commercial paper and presenting it.

The proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin does not involve an expansion of the currency to the extent of one single dollar.

USE OF AMERICAN GOODS IN FILLING GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, it is evident that the Senate is not going to conclude action on the home loan bank bill to-day. Therefore, I desire to speak on another matter for just a moment.

I ask that the clerk read section 5 of the appropriation bill for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, which was passed several days ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 5. In the expenditure of appropriations in this act or appropriations hereafter made, the Secretary of the Treasury in the case of the Treasury Department, and the Postmaster General in the case of the Post Office Department, shall, unless in his discretion the interest of the Government will not permit, purchase, or contract for, within the limits of the United States, only articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that such articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States may cost more, if such excess of cost be not unreasonable. In giving effect to this section special consideration shall be given to the domestic article where the raw material of which the article is made is grown in the United States and the article is manufactured in the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the administration and the Post Office Department made a great play some time ago by stating that this provision in the appropriation bill would permit the Post Office Department and the Treasury Department to buy American-made and American-produced goods. It will be noted that the language is, "shall, unless in his discretion the interest of the Government will not permit, purchase or contract for," and so on, "only articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that such articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States may cost more"—notwithstanding these articles may cost more—"if such excess of cost be not unreasonable."

The the Congress went farther, to show its intent that the department should use American-grown and American-manufactured goods, and said:

> In giving effect to this section special consideration shall be given to the domestic article where the raw material of which the article is made is grown in the United States and the article is manufactured in the United States.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the manner in which the Post Office Department is administering this new section. Immediately when the law went into effect it awarded a contract for twine, amounting to $142,400, to a jute manufacturer known as the Ludlow Sales Corporation, in Boston. The difference between the amount to be paid that company and the amount that would have been paid had cotton twine been used was only $2,000. The bid on the jute was 8.9 cents per pound. The bid on the cotton was 9 cents per pound, 800 yards to the pound. For 840 yards to the pound of cotton, the bid was 9.15 cents, as against 8.9 for jute of 814 yards to the pound.

Mr. President, if the Post Office Department had carried out the spirit and the intent of the act, it would have resulted, over a year's period, in the consumption of between 7,500 and 8,000 bales of American-produced cotton. I am advised that this would have given employment to two small cotton mills. But, instead, the Post Office Department awarded the contract for jute, an article of foreign production, I suppose from India. Under the pretext that it is manufactured in this country the Post Office Department said it felt compelled to buy the jute, notwithstanding the language of the statute, which is that the Postmaster General shall, unless in his discretion the interests of the Government will not permit, even though the American article may cost more, purchase the American-grown and American-manufactured article. Further it was directed that special consideration should be given to articles of American growth and American manufacture, and yet the Postmaster General finds that a difference of $2,000 in a contract of $142,400 is of such great consequence that he can not purchase the article of domestic production and manufacture.

Mr. President, I denounce the policy of the Post Office Department as being absolutely in the face of the spirit and intent of the statute. Its action is a fraud on the law. It is a perfect betrayal of all of its profession that it intends to use articles of the growth and manufacture of the United States. There was a loud display and profession some time ago that it was the purpose of the administration and of the Post Office Department to encourage the use of articles of growth and manufacture in the United States. Now at a time when agriculture, one of whose chief branches is that of the cotton industry, is suffering a reduction in price, the greatest in the history of the cotton industry; when cotton is lower than it has been for 75 years; and when the American people are in distress, in the face of an almost obligatory command of Congress, the Postmaster General finds this one little loophole, an infinitesimal hole through which he was able to crawl, and he awards this contract in this amount of money to a foreign product and gives preference to foreign laborers in India and acts directly against the American farmer and the American producer. It is an outrage upon American agriculture and upon the American people and is an absolute slap in the face of the Congress which enacted the statute.

HOME-LOAN BANKS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROOKHART obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to enable me to submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to propose a request for unanimous consent that when the Senate shall have concluded its business to-day it adjourn until Monday morning at 11 o'clock; and that after the routine morning business on that day the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII, and shall continue the call of the calendar until 1 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, of course, I have no objection, but I hope the Senator will couple with his request an agreement not to adjourn to-day until we shall have disposed of the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. McNARY. I have made no reference to that. I have provided merely that "when the Senate shall conclude its business to-day," whether it be an hour from now or four hours from now, we shall adjourn until 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] have discussed the nature of our currency. The Senator from Michigan said we should avoid all appearance of "defacement" of the currency, and based that on a comment in the newspapers. The Senator from Pennsylvania described our currency as "the honest dollar." The Senator from Pennsylvania has left the Chamber, but I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan if our dollar fixed the value of commodities in 1926, and if a rural community issued bonds to build a schoolhouse at that time and would now, in 1932, come to pay those bonds, and our currency would require two and one-half times as much of the commodities to pay those bonds as of the date they were contracted, would he believe we are operating under a "defaced" currency now?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, the net value of the Senator's arithmetic is unanswerable; but so far as the term "debasement" is understood as an idiom of the day, he well knows that it refers to something else, and I am sure he will agree with me that it is inadvisable to have any misunderstanding.

Mr. BROOKHART. Did the Senator use the term "debase" or "deface"?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Debase.

Mr. BROOKHART. I misunderstood the term, but taking it on the basis of the term "debase" I want to add to the definition of a debased currency a currency that is unduly inflated in value as well as one that is unduly deflated in value. One is just as much a debasement as the other and does just as much injustice to the people of the country as the other.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] talked about an honest currency. A currency that changes the values in that way for the payment of debts is not an honest currency. It is just as dishonest when it is inflated in value, thereby deflating the value of commodities, as it is when it is deflated in value and commodities rise to an undue price level. Either one of those is debasement, and one is just as much to be condemned as the other. We are in a situation where the value of the dollar has been inflated, and inflated enormously, and the prices of commodities deflated accordingly, and this debasement or dishonesty, whatever it may be called, is what we are seeking to correct by the amendment.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] pointed out in his speech yesterday that—

> In pursuance of that system the Federal reserve banks have gone into the open money market in the metropolitan districts purchasing bonds, for which they had not one particle of use, to the amazing extent of $900,000,000—now owning a total of one billion eight hundred million of United States securities—with the idea that these great banks in the money centers would trickle their liquidity down to the member banks throughout the country districts, and thereby induce the member banks throughout the country to embark on a more liberal discounting program and a broader resumption of banking business. The theory was that when this should be done there would be a very appreciable increase in commodity prices. It simply has not worked.

Mr. President, I think the statement of the Senator from Virginia is substantially correct. I think it has worked out substantially as he said, but all that was done in that so-called inflation was to transfer the bonds from the hands of one party to the hands of another party. There really was no inflation at all. We have the bonds, and we have the money just as we had before. They are in different hands, that is all. An inflation of bonds, of course, has a similar effect to an inflation of currency, and the high prices of the war were due to bond inflation and somewhat to currency inflation; but when we simply transfer from one to the other I think the position of the Senator from Virginia is correct, and we will not get much increase in commodity prices out of that sort of operation.

The present situation is a little different. The banks will buy the bonds if they do not already have them. That will be such an operation as the Senator from Virginia described. In addition to that after they get the bonds they will be put up as security for the new currency, and there will actually be a currency expansion to the amount of the issue of new money. That will have a tendency to raise commodity prices. There is that different situation from what has preceded in the open-market operations. I never had any confidence in the open-market operations as a control of commodity prices to anything like a normal level. The question with me is whether or not a mere $1,000,000,000 will raise these commodities whereas in agriculture we require two and one-half times as much as in 1926 to pay our debts. I do not think it will.

There is another objection to it that has been raised by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], and that is that this expansion is to be made because it is profitable to banks. These notes have been issued throughout the history of the national banking system on that basis. I agree that was contrary to the Andrew Jackson principles of Democracy in the old days. Therefore, while this will indirectly do some good and will indirectly have some effect on commodity prices, it is not enough, it is not anything like enough, and we will find when we have tried it that this little $1,000,000,000 of expansion, if it occurs, has only slightly affected the general level of commodity prices.

There are two ways, as I said, of bringing about expansion, one by bond issues and the other by money issues. In this case it is to be a money issue. If we had paid the soldiers' bonus with a money issue, we would have expanded the currency directly and it would have had a direct effect on commodity prices much greater and without having the profits taken up by the banking institutions that have not earned them. If we had issued Treasury notes to handle the agricultural surplus, which would take about $1,000,000,000, that would have given us a direct expansion that would affect commodity prices. The same would result if we issued them for unemployment relief. The whole trouble with this bill is that we are not doing enough to give us any substantial benefit in the way of restoring commodity prices to where they belong. We are not restoring the debased dollar by inflation, by reducing it down to where its value should be. We are only taking a little nibble at the situation.

Mr. President, there is one other statement the Senator from Virginia made in his speech of yesterday which I can not allow to pass without a brief analysis. It was to the effect that the deflation policy of 1920–21 was not the cause of the reduction of commodity prices. The Senator from Virginia has always taken that view, and, as I see it, that conclusion comes from a failure to analyze all the facts. I want to discuss those facts now from the standpoint of the speech which the Senator from Virginia himself made upon the question of the Whole Truth About the Federal Reserve System, which was delivered January 16 and 17, 1922.

Mr. President, I am not going to dispute any fact which the Senator from Virginia stated in that speech; I know all the facts he recited to be correct and true according to the record; but I am going to state some additional facts that are not set forth in his speech, and then point out what I deem to be the logical conclusion in reference to that deflation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia says in the speech referred to that it was during a period of the expansion of Federal reserve credits that the falling in the prices of commodities occurred. That is correct as a chronological statement, but, there were some other things that happened in that chronology that are left out of the speech. I have here the letter of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, sent to the United States Senate on May 25, 1920, in answer to a resolution of the Senate to this effect:

Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be directed to advise the Senate what steps it proposes to take or to recommend to the member banks of the Federal reserve system to meet the existing inflation of currency and credit and consequent high prices, and what further steps it proposes to take or recommend to mobilize credits in order to move the 1920 crop.

So by formal resolution of the 25th of May, 1920, the United States Senate had taken a position in that it inquired at least about methods of deflation of commodity prices especially relating to currency inflation. That was the idea of the resolution it adopted, which went to the Federal Reserve Board on the 17th of May; on the 18th of May the board held its meeting, and in response to that resolution a letter was written by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board to the United States Senate. In that letter, the date of which is important, much is said about this deflation policy. I quote from the letter, as follows:

Liquidation during these months is entirely natural and healthy, and is necessary in order that the banks may be prepared to meet the demands made upon them during the crop making and harvesting seasons, but there has been no such liquidation and, on the contrary, commercial loans have steadily increased.

Criticizing the increase of commercial loans.

Then again this letter says:

Upon receipt of a notice that the council would hold its regular meeting on May 17, the board extended an invitation to the three class A directors of each Federal reserve bank, who are the representatives of the stock-holding banks, to come to Washington at the same time for conference with the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal advisory council. This conference was held on the 18th instant, and it was developed at the meeting that the present credit expansion is due in great part to the abnormally high prices of goods and commodities now prevailing throughout the country and to the congestion of foodstuffs and essential raw materials at or near points of production because of lack of transportation facilities.

Again, Mr. President, pointing out that the clear object of these meetings, the Senate proceeding and all, was the deflation of the abnormally high prices.

The board is convinced that if the unsold portions of last year's crops can be brought to market before the new crop matures, the liquidation of credits which are now tied up in carrying the old crops will be sufficient to offset to a considerable degree the credit demands which will be made upon the banks in moving the crop of 1920.

Then again the letter states:

Banks were cautioned, however, that drastic steps should be avoided and that the method adopted should be orderly, for gradual liquidation will result in permanent improvements, while too rapid deflation would be injurious and should be avoided.

Again using the direct term "deflation" in describing this situation. Then again the letter states:

On the other hand, there is nothing in the Federal reserve act which requires a Federal reserve bank to make any investment or to rediscount any particular paper or class of paper. The language of both sections 13 and 14 is permissive only. Section 4 of the Federal reserve act, however, requires the directors of a Federal reserve bank to administer their affairs "fairly and impartially and without discrimination in favor of or against any member bank" and subject to the provisions of law and the orders of the Federal Reserve Board to extend "to each member bank such discounts, advancements, and accommodations as may be safely and reasonably made with due regard for the claims and demands of other member banks." Thus the directors of a Federal Reserve Board have the power to limit the volume and character of loans which, in their judgment, may be safely and reasonably made to any member bank.

Again pointing out distinctly to the banks of the country their power to bring about the deflation.

Again, this letter says:

This amendment, however, does not repeal or modify sections 4 and 13, and a Federal reserve bank is still free to decline to discount any paper which in its judgment does not constitute a desirable investment for it or which in its opinion would not constitute a safe and reasonable investment within the meaning of section 4.

There are many other quotations in this letter to the same effect. I ask that the entire letter may be inserted in the RECORD; I will not take the time to read it all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, May 25, 1920.

SIR: On May 17, 1920, the Senate adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be directed to advise the Senate what steps it purposes to take or to recommend to the member banks of the Federal reserve system to meet the existing inflation of currency and credits and consequent high prices, and what further steps it purposes to take or recommend to mobilize credits in order to move the 1920 crop."

In response the board desires to say that it has recognized for many months past that the expansion of bank credits in this country was proceeding at a rate not warranted by the production and consumption of goods. It has repeatedly admonished the Federal reserve banks that influence should be exerted upon the member banks to induce them to avoid undue expansion of loans and to keep their volume of outstanding credits within moderate bounds.

Beginning six months ago, the rates of discount on various classes of paper at the Federal reserve banks were advanced. During the latter part of January the present rates were put into effect. These advances, while undoubtedly checking credit transactions which otherwise would have been made, have not been entirely effective in bringing about the reduction in loans desired and which might normally have been expected during the early months of the year. Liquidation during these months is entirely natural and healthy, and is necessary in order that the banks may be prepared to meet the demands made upon them during the crop making and harvesting seasons, but there has been no such liquidation and, on the contrary, commercial loans have steadily increased. Thus it appears that the public has anticipated demands for banking credit which are usually made later on in the year. The average reserves of the Federal reserve banks are now a little over 42½ per cent, as against 45 per cent at the beginning of the year and about 51 per cent 12 months ago.

The Federal advisory council, which is composed of one member from each Federal reserve district elected annually by the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank, is required by section 12 of the Federal reserve act to meet in Washington at least four times each year. The council is authorized "to confer directly with the Federal Reserve Board on general business conditions; to make oral or written representations concerning matters within the jurisdiction of said board; to call for information and to make recommendations in regard to discount rates, rediscount business, note issues, reserve conditions in the various districts, the purchase and sale of gold or securities by reserve banks, open-market operations by said banks, and the general affairs of the reserve banking system."

Upon receipt of a notice that the council would hold its regular meeting on May 17, the board extended an invitation to the three class A directors of each Federal reserve bank, who are the representatives of the stockholding banks, to come to Washington at the same time for conference with the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal advisory council. This conference was held on the 18th instant, and it was developed at the meeting that the present credit expansion is due in great part to the abnormally high prices of goods and commodities now prevailing throughout the country and to the congestion of foodstuffs and essential raw materials at or near points of production because of lack of transportation facilities.

The board is convinced that if the unsold portions of last year's crops can be brought to market before the new crop matures the liquidation of credits which are now tied up in carrying the old crops will be sufficient to offset to a considerable degree the credit demands which will be made upon the banks in moving the crop of 1920.

At the conference above referred to the board's views were outlined by its governor substantially as follows: The member banks should lean less heavily upon the Federal reserve banks and rely more upon their own resources, unnecessary and habitual borrowing should be discouraged, and the liquidation of long-standing, nonessential loans should proceed. Banks were cautioned, however, that drastic steps should be avoided and that the methods adopted should be orderly; for gradual liquidation will result in permanent improvement, while too rapid deflation would be injurious and should be avoided. The board pointed out the necessity for extending such credits as may be necessary to promote essential production, especially of foodstuffs, and that if for any reason it should prove impracticable to increase essential production, there should be greater economy in consumption and more moderation in the use of credit. The problem of the banking system of the country is to check further expansion and to bring about a normal and healthy liquidation without curtailing essential production and without shock to industry, and, as far as possible, without disturbance of legitimate commerce and business. In order to effect this it seems necessary to distinguish between essential and nonessential loans; but the Federal Reserve Board feels it would be a most difficult task, which it should not undertake, to attempt by general rule of country-wide application to make this distinction. During the war there was a broad underlying principle that essentials must be "necessary or contributory to the conduct of the war"; but notwithstanding the sharp outline of this principle, much difficulty was experienced by the various war boards in defining essentials and nonessentials. All the more difficult would it be for the Federal Reserve Board to make such a general definition in the present circumstances.

Section 13 of the Federal reserve act defines the eligibility of paper for discount by the Federal reserve banks and lays down a general rule that any paper maturing within the time prescribed and "issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes or the proceeds of which have been used or are to be used for such purposes" is eligible. No expressed condition is made regarding the essential or nonessential character of the transactions giving rise to notes which may be offered for discount, and the Federal Reserve Board is not required, and properly could not be expected, generally to adopt such a criterion of eligibility. It is too much a matter of local conditions and local knowledge to justify at this time any general country-wide ruling by the board, even if such a ruling were deemed helpful.

On the other hand, there is nothing in the Federal reserve act which requires a Federal reserve bank to make any investment or to rediscount any particular paper or class of paper. The language of both sections 13 and 14 is permissive only. Section 4 of the Federal reserve act, however, requires the directors of a Federal reserve bank to administer its affairs "fairly and impartially and without discrimination in favor of or against any member bank" and, subject to the provisions of law and the orders of the Federal Reserve Board, to extend "to each member bank such discounts, advancements, and accommodations as may be safely and reasonably made, with due regard for the claims and demands of other member banks." Thus the directors of a Federal reserve bank have the power to limit the volume and character of loans which in their judgment may be safely and reasonably made to any member bank.

The recent amendment to paragraph (d) of section 14 distinctly authorizes each Federal reserve bank on its own account, without reference to action taken by any other Federal reserve bank, to establish a normal discount or credit line for each member bank and permits the imposition of graduated rates on discount lines in excess of the normal line. This amendment, however, does not repeal or modify sections 4 and 13, and a Federal reserve bank is still free to decline to discount any paper which in its judgment does not constitute a desirable investment for it or which, in its opinion, would not constitute a safe and reasonable investment within the meaning of section 4.

It is the view of the board, however, that while Federal reserve banks may properly undertake in their transactions with member banks to discriminate between essential and nonessential loans, nevertheless that discrimination might much better be made at the source by the member banks themselves. The individual banker comes in direct contact with his customers; he is better qualified than anyone else to advise the customer because of his familiarity, not only with the customer's business, but with the general business conditions and needs in his immediate locality. In making loans he is bound by no general rule of law as to the character of the purpose for which a loan is being asked. He is entirely free to exercise discretion and can make one loan and decline another as his judgment may dictate. He can estimate with a fair degree of accuracy the legitimate demands for credit which are liable to be made upon him, as well as the fluctuations in the volume of his deposits. He knows what industries sustain his community, and is thus qualified to pass upon the essential or nonessential character of loans offered him. He knows, or should know, what rediscount line he may reasonably expect of his Federal reserve bank, and he ought not to regard this line as a permanent addition to his capital. With knowledge of the limitations or penalties put upon his borrowings from the Federal reserve bank, the banker may be depended upon to use a more discriminating judgment in granting credit accommodations to his customers, and that judgment he must exercise if the present situation is to be remedied fundamentally.

It is true that under existing conditions the volume of credit required in any transaction is much greater than was the case in pre-war times; but it is also true that the resources of the member and nonmember banks would be ample to take care of the essential business of the country and to a large extent of nonessentials as well if there were a freer flow of goods and credit. If "frozen loans" were liquefied, and if commodities which are held back either for speculative purposes or because of lack of transportation facilities should go to the markets, and if large stocks of merchandise should be reduced, the resultant release of credit would have a most beneficial effect upon the general situation. In the meantime everything must be done to expedite the release of these credits and to restrict nonessential credits in future.

While the problem of credit regulation and control is national and even international in its scope, yet in the last analysis it is merely an aggregation of individual problems, and the proper working out of the situation must depend upon the public and upon the banks which deal with the public. The public must be made to realize the necessity of economy in expenditures and in consequent demands for banking credit. The banks themselves are best able to impress the importance of this policy upon the public.

For the further information of the Senate the board quotes from the report of the Federal advisory council made to it on May 18, signed by James B. Forgan, president:

"The council has given consideration to the matters included in your communication of April 17, and begs to reply thereto in the following manner, following the order set out by you:

"'(a) Causes of continued expansion of credits and of Federal note issues.'

"There are many contributing causes, of which the following may be regarded as paramount:

"1. We recognize, of course, that the first cause is the Great War.

"2. Great extravagance—national, municipal, and individual.

"3. Inefficiency and indifference of labor, resulting in lessening production.

"4. A shortage of transportation facilities, thus preventing the normal movement of commodities.

"5. The vicious circle of increasing wages and prices.

"'(b) How can the reserve position of the Federal reserve banks be materially strengthened before the seasonal demand sets in next fall without undue disturbance of the processes of production and distribution?'

"By urging upon member banks through the Federal reserve banks the wisdom of showing borrowers the necessity of the curtailment of general credits, and especially for nonessential uses, as well as continuing to discourage loans for capital and speculative purposes; by checking excessive borrowings through the application of higher rates.

"'(c) If steps can not be taken at this time leading to a more normal proportion between the volume of credits and the volume of goods, when can they be taken?'

"In our opinion, steps should be taken now, as outlined in answer to the last question.

"'(d) What is the effect upon the general situation of the increased Treasury borrowings and what should be the policy of the Federal reserve banks in establishing rates of discount on paper secured by certificates of indebtedness?'

"It is obvious that the borrowings of the Treasury have the same effect upon the general credit situation as those of other borrowers. The council would suggest the wisdom of congressional relief from the burden of Government financing by a policy of rigid economy; the revision of the tax laws for the sake of a more equitable distribution of the burden without reducing the revenue; the enactment of the Budget system, the Budget to include provision for the gradual payment of the short-time obligations of the Treasury. These would of necessity preclude unwise appropriations, such as the proposed soldiers' bonus.

"In view of the large volume of Treasury certificates of indebtedness carried by member banks at the instance of the Treasury Department, we believe that rates established by the Federal reserve banks on paper secured by them should not be materially greater than the rates borne by the certificates."

The board feels assured that the banks of the country now realize the necessity of more conservatism in extending credits and of a reasonable reduction in the volume of credits now outstanding. The board will not hesitate, so far as it may be necessary, to bring to bear all its statutory powers in regulating the volume of credit, but wishes to point out that the more vital problems relating to the movement of the 1920 crop are physical rather than financial.

This was the unanimous view of those present at the conference on the 18th instant, at which the following resolution was adopted:

"The whole country is suffering from inflation of prices with the consequent inflation of credit. From reports made by the members of this conference, representing every section of the country, it is obvious that great sums are tied up in products which if marketed would relieve necessity, tend to reduce the price level, and relieve the strain on our credit system.

"This congestion of freight is found in practically all of the large railroad centers and shipping ports. It arises chiefly from inadequate transportation facilities available at this time and is seriously crippling business. We are informed that the per ton-mile of freight increased in three years—1916, 1917, and 1918—47 per cent, while the freight cars in service during the same period increased 1.9 per cent.

"A striking necessity exists which can only be relieved through the upbuilding of the credit of the railroads. This must come through adequate and prompt increase in freight rates. Any delay means the paying of greater cost directly and indirectly and places a burden on the credit system which in the approaching time for season expansion may cause abnormal strain. Even under the load of war inflation, high-price level, and extravagances the bank reserves would probably be sufficient if quick transportation could be assured during the time of the greatest strain: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this conference urge as the most important remedies that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board give increased rates and adequate facilities such immediate effect as may be warranted under their authority and that a committee of five, representing the various sections of the country, be appointed by the chairman to present this resolution to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board with such verbal presentation as may seem appropriate to the committee."

Much will depend upon the restoration of the normal efficiency of railroad and steamship lines. If adequate transportation facilities can be provided, the board sees no occasion for apprehension in connection with the movement of crops now being grown.

Respectfully,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have thus particularly gone into these quotations to show that it was the distinct policy of the Federal reserve system and of the United States Senate, too, on the 17th day of May, 1920, to bring about a policy of deflation of commodity prices in the United States. There can be no doubt of that conclusion; and I will have to say to the Senator from Virginia that that fact was entirely omitted from his speech in 1922.

What happened as the result of that condition? There are some things, of course, that do not appear in the record; but this policy, so far as I have read it here, was made public. The Senate knew, and the country knew, that the deflation was coming. There was a further secret policy adopted at that meeting of the board of raising the discount rate so high that it would force the deflation. That, however, was not made public at the time.

Mr. President, the big financial crowd in this country had been calling for deflation, they had been preparing for it, and they knew what it meant when it came along. I think the ordinary people of the country had little idea or understanding of what deflation would mean. But high finance knew what it meant, and here is what it did. I am able to give some specific instances.

Armour & Co. went out immediately after this meeting—and a banker attended it—for a loan of $60,000,000; they offered 8 per cent in order to get the money, and they got it in a short time. I do not think one can find another case in the whole history of Armour & Co. where that organization went out for a 10-year loan and paid 8 per cent to get the money. Swift & Co. did likewise for a $50,000,000 loan; the Sinclair Oil Co. did likewise for a $46,000,000 loan. They were forehanded and went after the loan even before this meeting was held. Those three instances, which I have run down specifically and know about, are only samples of what happened. All of the other big oil companies did the same thing; the International Harvester Co. did the same thing; and all the other big businesses of the country, save and except Henry Ford. He is the only one I know of who did not appreciate or was not tipped off to the situation. The others, however, went out and gathered up these loans.

It has been said to me—and many Senators seem to entertain the idea—that the big organizations would not obtain loans like those when deflation was coming along. It is said that prices were going down and it would be harder to pay those loans, and hence it would be unreasonable that they would get the loans in the face of the deflation.

Mr. President, there is a fundamental idea underlying the action which the big interests took which is not understood and not appreciated by some of the most distinguished Senators on this floor. If the organizations to which I have referred had obtained the loans and bought commodities with the money, then, of course, they would have lost in the deflation, because commodity prices were deflated; but as commodities are deflated credit money is inflated, and if they held their investment in credit or in money, which they did, then they were on the rising side and not upon the falling side. The fact that this was an investment of credit itself in money is overlooked by those Senators who say that the big interests would not borrow money preceding a deflation of commodity prices.

Here is the way it worked out in reference to Government bonds: The farmers who had borrowed money from the banks to buy Liberty bonds during the campaigns which were undertaken and other people who had borrowed money from the banks in order to buy those bonds had their obligations called as a result of the deflation. The very credit which they had was transferred to the big financial interests that gathered up this vast amount of credit in the United States; and the little investors, in order to meet their obligations on the call of the banks, were forced to sell their Government bonds, and so Government bonds went as low as 79 cents on the dollar. I found one case in Ohio where these Government obligations sold for as low as 79 cents, and in many instances they sold for 80 and 85 cents on the dollar.

It is claimed that those who had obtained this credit, who had stored up the credit, who had control of the credit, and who still had it, if they wanted to, could buy these bonds at the low figures, and they did. A large part of this transaction was occasioned for the purpose of speculation in Government bonds at the expense of the common people of the country, so they would buy these bonds back when they were low. They had the credit facilities to do it. If they just held their credit in the banks and did not invest it at all, all they could lose would be the interest rate on it, and they would get some interest from the bank. Then if commodities went down they could buy the cheap commodities and then expect, as they did in 1928 and 1929, to reap an enormous profit because of the general rise of commodities, except agricultural commodities, which did not rise so much.

Mr. President, I think that explains how the control of credit was taken by the big financial interests of the country and how they took advantage of the deflation policy of the Federal reserve system.

The Senator from Virginia tells in his speech entitled "The Truth About the Federal Reserve System" that there was no deflation of Federal reserve credit; that it was, in fact, inflated and that the Federal reserve loans were, in fact increased; and, Mr. President, that statement is true, but it fails to meet the analysis of the whole situation. Why did they increase these Federal reserve loans after this 18th of May meeting, when it was unanimously decided and unanimously reported to the United States Senate that we had too many of them?

There were two reasons that would justify a further increase. One is, the date was May 18, and a little later the question of moving the crop would come along, and that called for a greatly increased credit every year. Then there was another reason, and that was the most potent reason at that time. That was because this big financial crowd wanted to store up this extra credit of the country for the deflation that was sure to follow, and they went out, and those notes that I have described were sent out all over my State. One Congressman in my State bought $2,000 of that Armour paper. They were bought all over the United States; and in order for the banks to accommodate these big fellows and take care of their paper, it was necessary to rediscount more in the Federal reserve system. So there was an increase instead of a decrease, although this meeting had unanimously decided that there were too many Federal reserve loans, and that we were overinflated, and they ought to be reduced.

The Senator from Virginia, on page 17 of his printed speech, points out that in January the loans of Federal reserve banks on agricultural and livestock paper for 1920 were only $56,000,000, but by December they had increased to $246,000,000. I am leaving off the odd thousands. That, again, is absolutely true; and that increase would be the natural increase for financing the crop each year, except that it is not enough.

Now, let us see about the $246,000,000. Those are all of the loans to agriculture for all of the Federal reserve banks in the whole United States; and yet I have told you here of three loans that amounted to $156,000,000 to three companies, and there were thousands of other companies that got big loans in that way. So after we get out of the Senator's speech the total figures of what was done for agriculture we find that it is only a drop in the bucket. The agricultural crop of 1920, before this deflation of values began, was worth $17,000,000,000. What is $246,000,000 toward financing a $17,000,000,000 crop? Again, it shows that agriculture was not considered in any due proportion in figuring out these matters.

Now about the reduction of prices, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the Senator's own figures as to when these reductions occurred.

In January, 1920, cotton was worth 35.9 cents. In October it was worth 25.5 cents. In September it was still worth 31.1 cents. The 31.1 cents would probably be about the natural decline that would occur at crop time on cotton, from 35.9 to 31.1. That probably would be about what would happen in the ordinary year, because at the harvesting time all these crops are depressed and reduced; but, beginning with that, in October it dropped to 25.5, in November to 19.4, and in December to 14.

When this deflation policy was put on that I have outlined to you, on the 18th day of May, cotton was still up to 36 or 37 cents a pound; but the operation of this deflation policy, which was inaugurated and declared both by the Senate and by the Federal Reserve Board back in May, and then the operations of the financial crowd in deflating the credit by going out and taking control of it, although the Federal reserve loans were increased, started the decline in cotton; and it was that deflation policy that did it. It was not the decline in cotton that started the deflation policy.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. LONG. What was the reason given at the time for this deflation policy?

Mr. BROOKHART. The reason given was that commodity prices were too high and the cost of living was too great. We heard a great howl about the cost of living at that time.

Now, Mr. President, when the acts of all are considered, the acts of those outside of the Federal reserve system as well as those inside, when what actually happened is considered, there can be no doubt but that the policy of the Federal Reserve Board, together with the policy of the Congress, started this great deflation of 1920.

I have said, and I say now, that neither the Federal Reserve Board nor any other board has any right ever even to consider a general policy of deflation. I say that that is always an economic crime.

They have a right to stop inflation. They have a right to say "no" when those loans are asked, and to prevent an inflation; but after they had approved these loans, then I say they had no right to turn around and call them. In this case they not only had approved these loans, but every Federal reserve bank in the United States in the spring of 1919 had solicited loans of this kind from its member banks. They had written letters to those that were not borrowing, and had pointed out to them that they were not taking advantage of their privilege in the Federal reserve system.

So in this case they encouraged this inflation, and then turned around and adopted a policy of general deflation; and that policy worked out indirectly, because as soon as the big financial crowd knew it was coming they wanted to get control of the one commodity that was going to rise in price during this deflation and that commodity was credit or money. Credit or money is the one thing and the only thing that rises when we have a deflation. Everything else falls. Wanting to get control of that, they went out and for that purpose the Federal reserve loans were increased. By taking the bare figures we would say we did not deflate; we inflated; but the deflation occurred because that credit was sealed up and held. It was not invested in commodities. It was held for the purpose of safety after the deflation had occurred.

Mr. President, somewhat of that deflation policy has been continued ever since. We have never gotten free from it; and that is one reason why this bill is proposed for a certain degree of inflation of the currency. It is not enough of an inflation, however. This bill might do a little bit of good, but it will not do much good. It is a small, little bite out of the cherry. It is just like everything else this Congress has done for the relief of this country. Everything has been inadequate.

We passed to-day another bill amending the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. We have already poured about $2,000,000,000 into that gigantic economic rat hole, and it has gone down without generally affecting commodity prices. Now we are going to pour in $1,800,000,000, and it is not done in any way to handle the proposition. That is the trouble about all of these measures. They have all been fearful and afraid, and they have all been inadequate. The result is going to be, and has been so far, that commodity prices, instead of advancing, have declined. Only one or two agricultural commodities have advanced in any substantial way in price, and those have not yet advanced anywhere near to a cost-of-production level.

So, Mr. President, while this amendment has a little merit in it, and while it will give us some little bit of expansion, I hope the country will look upon it at its true face value, and that means it has only a small value to the general situation in the country.

FAIR TRADE AND CHAIN STORES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, notwithstanding the unprecedented volume of important legislation which the Congress has enacted at the session now nearing its close, there remains one great urgent question with which we have not dealt. I feel that we will be remiss if we adjourn without taking up S. 97, a bill now on the calendar, which if enacted will do more, and more quickly, to counteract the industrial stagnation and start the resumption of trade activity and employment than anything that we could do.

In 1925, during the Sixty-ninth Congress, the bill known as the fair trade bill, to legalize resale price agreements, was introduced by myself in the Senate and by Representative CLYDE KELLY, of Pennsylvania, in the House of Representatives.

In 1926, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House held extensive hearings at which abundant opportunity was given to proponents and opponents.

As a result of these hearings a subcommittee was appointed to make a careful study of this important business problem. This subcommittee, in 1927, reported that such legislation is in the public interest and should be enacted.

In 1929 the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce again considered the bill, and on January 27, 1930, made a favorable report urging that prompt action be taken.

The Rules Committee of the House made the bill a special order, and it was passed by the House of Representatives with amendments on January 29, 1931.

The Senate found it impossible to act during the short period before adjournment on March 4.

The measure was reintroduced on the first day of this Congress. The Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate held hearings early in the session and reported the bill to the calendar. Surely there should be no further delay in acting. For seven years at least there has been need for its enactment, but no action has been taken. During that period at least 400,000 independent merchants have been destroyed by the predatory competition this measure seeks to prevent.

I want to serve notice now that I shall insist upon action at the beginning of the next session and hope to have the help and cooperation of every upholder of fair competition in American business.

Mr. President, this bill does not deal directly with agriculture; yet, as one who comes from the great farm area, I know that there can be no prosperity for agriculture while other sections of the population have not the means to purchase the products of the farm. This bill is not designed primarily for employment relief, yet it holds within its effects the best, the only genuine relief—the starting of the wheels of industry, which means jobs rather than doles.

If there is any single lesson which stands out with unmistakable clearness from our experience since 1929, it is that our great "captains" of industry, commerce, and finance have failed to supply the leadership to show the way out of our difficulties. Not to the few but to the many must a democracy look for relief in time of trouble. Contrasting with the helplessness of the mammoth organizations to meet the emergency, we find the smaller ones leading the way to more stable conditions.

The reason, says the Manufacturers Record, of Baltimore, is that—

> They are more readily adaptable to the changes taking place; their close-knit organizations, under the control of direct ownership, have been more responsive to initiative and energetic management.

It says much more in substantiation of these facts.

Few of us here have had the experience or time to make vivid what is going on in the commercial world around us. We fail to realize what has been revealed by the Census of Distribution, now making known for the first time many vital statistics of our country.

We labor under false impressions of assumed superior efficiency on the part of big business, and many think the passing of the small business man is inevitable. Sad the day for any nation, Mr. President, when the farm-owning farmer is turned into a peasant, the mechanic into a proletarian, and the merchant into a clerk! Yet, unless something happens very soon to alter the current, the middle class in the United States is going to be wiped out—not from inferior ability to serve the public, but from unjust and artificial handicaps which it is our duty to understand and to remove here to-day.

Two strangely contrasting views are revealed. On the one hand it is said that nothing can be done because the tendency to consolidation has gone so far. On the other I find small realization of the desperate importance of the issue of the small business man.

The point of what I am talking about may be found in the retail market.

Most of what is raised by agriculture, dug from mines, or made in factories finds its way into use by the consumer across the counter of the retail store.

Mr. President, the retail business of the country amounts to more than $50,000,000,000 annually. Whoever controls this market holds in his hands the destiny of both the producer and the consumer. Our long-time progress has depended upon fair and active competitive conditions among retail stores.

Everyone has noted the rapid concentration of retailing in many lines of business into mammoth chains. Few have analyzed the cause or understood the threatening significance to us as a people. Many have regretted the development for sentimental or emotional reasons. Few perceive how it reaches back to the farm, the wage earner, and the manufacturer as the market is narrowed into the control of fewer and fewer hands.

Yet, Mr. President, the situation has not, as some of my colleagues believe, gone so far as to be irretrievable. Over 78 per cent of the retail trade is still in the hands of independent dealers, shared by some 1,300,000 merchants. The remaining 22 per cent is done by about 7,000 corporations, the largest of which operates about 18,000 grocery stores, and does a business of over $1,000,000,000 annually—more than enjoyed by such industrial giants as the United States Steel Corporation or the General Electric Co.

In the five years from 1924 to 1929 the growth of these chains absorbed from the total business done at retail an added 7 per cent of the country's sales. In other words, they did 14 per cent of the total in 1924 and over 21 per cent in 1929. The chains' own increase was more than 50 per cent during these five years. At this rate how long before the independent will become extinct?

If this was the result of better value giving or superior merit of any sort, as is superficially assumed by some, we might view the declination of our independent fellow citizen with complacency. But when it is accompanied by cruelly artificial and unfair tactics no right-spirited man who sees what is going on, and why, can remain passive. This thing goes on, because in our law we have elevated and sanctified property ownership so as to allow it privileges by which it is devouring us. In other words, we allow a corporation which owns 2 stores or 10 stores in a town or neighborhood, and which if owned separately by individuals would be considered competitors, to establish a uniform price on any or all articles in its different stores, while we make it illegal for the independent competitors to reach any understanding about uniform prices but compel them to fight each other and the chains. Ownership, which large capital permits over many stores, gives privileges denied the smaller man. Is that the equal opportunity our country was dedicated to afford?

Again, take the small manufacturer as against the great one. Our law permits the great concern to consign its merchandise to the dealers, calling them its agents. It owns the goods in its dealer's stores. It can then direct them as to the prices at which these goods may be sold. The dealer can not cut prices on goods that belong to the manufacturer. That manufacturer is saved the disaster of a cut-price war among his dealers. They can make a living profit on his goods. They will push them to the public in preference to the goods of other factories on which they must meet prices of competing dealers. The small manufacturer is not allowed to enter into arrangements with his dealers to whom he sells his goods for distribution. One dealer cuts. Others must meet him. Profits are gone. There is no incentive to handle. The small manufacturer is the victim of competition on his own goods among his dealers and loses business. If he were big enough and had capital enough to be able to consign his goods and own them in the retail stores, he would escape this penalty. What a travesty on equality of opportunity to permit the wealthy corporation to accomplish legally what we forbid the smaller competitor to accomplish at all.

These restrictions have fostered many unsound consolidations and mergers. Giant chains fighting each other are being merged. Great factories absorb smaller competitors. We are forcing consolidations that lead to monopoly. We are sick industrially and commercially to-day because of the unhealthy environment our false course has bred. Billions of unsound securities have wiped out the savings of many who bought them, thinking that a merger and a big one was in itself assurance of safety. Yet our legal monstrosity of putting ownership above contractual rights has forced many of these hot-house plants into existence.

Any community, any country, which tolerates, nay stipulates by its laws, such injustices as between its citizens can not hope forever to escape retribution. Now it has overtaken us. Let me not be misunderstood, Mr. President. I am arguing for, not against competition. But let it be fair, honest, and genuine, not deceptive and ruthless. The small dealer is being extinguished not because he can not compete, but because he is made to appear to be unable to do so.

The chief device which accounts for this deceptive appearance is the offering of so-called "loss-leader" bargain bait to the public at cut prices. In a sense it is trick merchandising. The trick is this. The big outlets, which can afford to stand temporary losses, take well-known standard articles such as Campbell's soup, or Colgate's tooth paste, or kodaks, or the Ingersoll dollar watch and advertise them at great reductions in conjunction with other articles of unidentified origin but ostensibly representing the same reduction below market values. Amidst a newspaper page of items, all purporting to be perhaps a third below real worth, will be sprinkled a few genuine bargains on standard articles whose values are known in every household. In other words, the names and public confidence of these nationally accepted goods are utilized to give credence to the claims for unknown goods, much as the old-time huckster packed his best apples on the top of the basket. Often, indeed, usually this amounts to misrepresentation by using the good names earned by others to cover doubtful transactions.

The owners of these names under the decisions of our courts are powerless to prevent these abuses. The makers of these articles which have earned public acceptance are forbidden to protect the multitude of independent dealers against the oppressive misuse of their good names in deceptive price cutting. Their trade-marks and good will may be employed against their will by big distributors who have no interest in them, but by predatory price cutting undermine the multitude of independents who wish to handle their products wholesomely and at reasonable but not ruinous prices. It is the underselling on these recognizable articles that is largely responsible for the notion that the chains give better values than the independents on everything. People have no way of knowing that the losses are recouped on bulk merchandise which they can not definitely compare. It is somewhat analagous to the practice by which the oil monopoly was established, when competitors were destroyed by selling at a loss in a given area while the losses were recouped through excessive prices in areas where competition had been eliminated. We have since then passed statutes forbidding these practices.

There is an impression that the big outlets can undersell because they can underbuy through quantity purchases. They can not and do not undersell in the main. To-day the independents in large measure have established cooperative joint purchasing agencies to get the benefit of bottom quantity prices. But apart from this the heavier overhead expenses of the chains offset most of their buying advantages. The average operating expense of the chain grocery is 18.2 per cent of its sales, according to the Harvard University Bureau of Retail Research. The ordinary service grocery runs at 13.8 per cent expense, or 4.4 per cent below the chain, according to the Alexander Hamilton Institute report. Similar advantages are found for independent shoe, drug, and other retailers over chains.

Dr. R. S. Alexander, professor of marketing, Columbia University, who conducted an investigation of the comparative values given to the public by chain stores and independent stores, says in a report of findings:

> On the whole * * * our survey indicates * * * that neither chains nor independents have any material price advantages.

Mr. President, it is a shame which we should not tolerate, that tens of thousands of small business men are being driven to the wall or turned into hired clerks for absentee-owned stores by practices which are socially and economically harmful.

Like the proverbial snowball, this movement has gained enormous momentum in the past five or six years. Its destructive force, the speed of its spread is increasing with every passing day. The important truth, however, is that the situation is still redeemable. Seventy-eight per cent of the country's $50,000,000,000 annual retail business is still in the hands of over a million and a quarter of independent retail merchants. If we act promptly, we can arrest the threatening tendency. We can preserve the business sections of our towns and cities in the hands of self-respecting and independent citizens. We can make it possible for the moderate-sized manufacturers permanently to find outlet for their products to the public without submitting to the terms imposed by monopolistic middlemen. We can assure to the public that the avenues of trade will be kept open so that people may continue to have a free choice among the market's varieties.

It is the chief objective of the Capper-Kelly bill, Senate bill 97, to restore the equality of opportunity for the smaller business man in his competition with the big corporation. We take nothing from the big concern, but we do put the small man on an equal footing in one important respect.

We simply make it permissible for the owner of trade-mark brands to enter into agreements with his distributors that his name shall not be made the cat's-paw to pull trade away from his many smaller dealers by using his goods as loss leaders and bargain bait.

We stop one of the unwholesome deceptions of business, which is not only working havoc among retailers by the thousands but is building monopolistic middlemen, who hold the welfare of the moderate-size manufacturers and the wage earners in their factories in their power as well as the buying public. We want no middlemen in such a position of power.

When this bill has become law the man with one store or a hundred men each owning a store will not be at a disadvantage in competing with the corporation operating a hundred stores in respect of branded merchandise. The moderate-size manufacturer will no longer be at a disadvantage as compared with the industrial giant with capital enough to consign its goods and use the dealers as agents. He will accomplish equality by means of contracts instead of capital. This is genuine economy which public policy ought to encourage. As Professor Seligman, of Columbia University, puts it, we will have taken one more forward step in the direction of fair competition. We will have wiped one more blot from our commercial escutcheon.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until next Monday at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), under the order previously entered, adjourned until Monday, July 11, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE

MONDAY, JULY 11, 1932

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. Joseph R. Sizoo, minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Gracious Father, in whose keeping are all our days, grant that we may labor this day with such devotion to country, such loyalty to truth, and such humbleness of mind that at the end of the day we may hear Thy voice, "Well done, good and faithful servant." Unto that end open our eyes that we may see Thee, our ears that we may hear Thee, our wills that we may obey Thee, and our hearts that we may love Thee. This we pray through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the calendar days of Friday and Saturday, July 8 and 9, 1932, when, on request of Mr. FESS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Dale	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Bailey	Davis	Kean	Schall
Barbour	Dickinson	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bingham	Dill	Keyes	Shipstead
Black	Fess	King	Shortridge
Blaine	Fletcher	La Follette	Smoot
Borah	Frazier	Lewis	Steiwer
Bratton	George	Long	Stephens
Broussard	Glass	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Bulkley	Goldsborough	McKellar	Townsend
Bulow	Gore	McNary	Trammell
Byrnes	Hale	Metcalf	Tydings
Capper	Harrison	Moses	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hastings	Norbeck	Wagner
Cohen	Hatfield	Norris	Walcott
Connally	Hayden	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Hebert	Patterson	Watson
Copeland	Howell	Pittman	White
Costigan	Hull	Reed

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is absent on official business in attendance upon the disarmament conference at Geneva.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I send to the desk a clipping which I ask to have read. It is from an article by one who signs himself R. B. S. in yesterday's Washington Post, in which appeared a reference to my connection with the eighteenth amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Morris really ought not to suffer from pride of authorship concerning the eighteenth amendment. For more than a decade he has been called the author of that document, so often, in fact, that he has begun to believe it himself. It is common knowledge, of course, that the late Wayne B. Wheeler, generalissimo of the dry forces, wrote the amendment himself and handed it to SHEPPARD to sign on the dotted line. SHEPPARD was a mere figurehead.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, these statements to the effect that Wayne B. Wheeler wrote the eighteenth amendment, handed it to me to sign, and that I was a mere figurehead are untrue. After years of study I prepared, wrote, and introduced in the Senate in April, 1917, the resolution which became the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I consulted others in the course of that study, both in Congress and out of Congress, embodying the results of this consultation and my own judgment in the resolution. I opened the debate leading to the adoption of the resolution in the Senate, conducted the debate for the dry side, and participated in the shaping of an important amendment on the floor.

When in January, 1919, I announced on the floor of the Senate that the thirty-sixth State had ratified the amendment, Senator Kenyon, of Iowa, addressed the Senate briefly. I ask that the clerk may read the statement which he made on that occasion in order that the Senate may judge whether my work in connection with the amendment was that of a figurehead.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, in view of the announcement of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] a few minutes ago as to the ratification of the prohibitory amendment by 36 States, I want to say just a word.

This marks the successful ending of the greatest moral battle waged in this country since the abolition of slavery. It has been a battle without compromise, as there can be no compromise between right and wrong. It is remarkable that this result could have been brought about so speedily. The power of the saloon is ended in the United States. As it passes to its grave it can go with the knowledge that it has been responsible for more misery and crime; more destruction of homes and debasement of character; more poverty, sorrow, and tears than any other agency the world has ever known. No one will weep over its demise. The United States will be a better and more prosperous Nation; its citizenship will be happier and more contented than ever.

I rise for the purpose, however, of felicitating the distinguished Senator from Texas, whose name will ever be associated with this movement. It must be a satisfaction to him to feel that, while the defenders of the liquor traffic may sneer at his efforts, the mothers of the Nation and the Christian citizenship of the land are thanking God that there came to Congress a man with the courage, persistency, vision, and love of humanity that he has manifested in standing amidst all the storms of abuse, not only in the Nation, but around the Capitol, and fighting through the good fight to the end.

With due regard to the many services performed by other Senators in this body in days gone by, it is my humble judgment—and I know it is the judgment of millions of people in the United States—that no greater service has ever been performed to humanity or righteousness and to the real best interest of this Nation than has been by the Senator from Texas. I extend to him my heartfelt felicitations upon this day, truly one of triumph for him, and I extend to the State of Texas congratulations that they have in this body the man who has been the leader in this great movement.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram from M. Ksahian, of Elmira, N. Y., relative to international finance, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted at its recent convention by the New York Association of Retail Meat Dealers, favoring repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution and the immediate modification of the Volstead Act, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the department of christian citizenship, Kentucky Woman's Christian Temperance Union, by Alice Lloyd, director, Nashville, Tenn., remonstrating against the passage of legislation legalizing the manufacture and sale of 3.2 per cent beer while the eighteenth amendment remains in the Constitution, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from Charles Bridge, chairman Erie Railroad Association, Deposit, N. Y., praying for the passage of the so-called Costigan-LaGuardia relief bill for the aid of the unemployed, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from Arthur J. Morris, chairman of the Morris Plan Corporation of America, New York City, N. Y., offering to place at the disposal of the Government the facilities of the Morris Plan Corporation of America and its affiliates in connection with the administration of an unemployment, relief measure making loans to individuals, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from the subcommittee on emergency relief of the Illinois Commission on Taxation and Expenditures, Chicago, Ill., stating, "This commission authorized by the Illinois Legislature respectfully urges your cooperation in enactment of Federal legislation immediately to give emergency relief to the State of Illinois on the basis of needs rather than population," which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the council of the city of St. Paul, Minn., favoring the enactment of the so-called Garner-Wagner emergency relief bill as an aid in the unemployment situation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from the National Committee for Trade Recovery, consisting of representatives of various associations,

New York City, N. Y., praying for the prompt enactment of the so-called Wagner public works and unemployment relief bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate memorials and telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens and workers' organizations of the States of Illinois, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Dies bill, being the bill (H. R. 12044) to provide for the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by Buffalo Post, No. 25, Jewish War Veterans of the United States, protesting against an alleged practice of the United States Civil Service Commission in specifying that applicants for positions should live within a certain distance of the proposed place of employment, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

He also presented memorials of various workers' organizations of the State of New York remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Dies bill, being the bill (H. R. 12044) to provide for the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4741) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Wellsburg, W. Va., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 993) thereon.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 361) to authorize the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service to make a survey as to the existing facilities for the protection of the public health in the care and treatment of leprous persons in the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 994) thereon.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 263) to investigate conditions respecting the sale and distribution of dairy products in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 995) thereon.

BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

A bill and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4969) to regulate the practice of professional engineering, creating a registration board for professional engineers of the District of Columbia, defining its powers and duties, providing penalties, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. FRAZIER (for Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma):

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 196) relating to the payment of interest in connection with certain judgments and overpayments of taxes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 197) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to render findings of fact in the claim of P. F. Gormley Co.; and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 198) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of Atlantic Works, of Boston, Mass.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CONNALLY:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 199) to provide for the sale of internal-revenue stamps by postmasters of the United States; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

LEAVE OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, it has come to my attention that in the passage of the economy bill great injustice is done to workers in the Government Printing Office. I am not going to take the time of the Senate now to explain what was done in the matter, but I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution for the purpose of correcting the injustice which has been done them. I ask that the resolution may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 200) relating to leave with pay for employees of the Government Printing Office was read twice by its title, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas under authority of existing law it is the practice of the Government Printing Office in granting annual leave with pay to grant such leave only after the employee has earned during the fiscal year the full 30 days' leave; and

Whereas the practice in other Government departments has been to grant leave as earned at the rate of 2½ days per month; and

Whereas the employees of the Government Printing Office in accordance with section 103 of Title I of Part II of the legislative appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, will be deprived not only of leave earned during the fiscal year 1932 but also of leave earned during the fiscal year 1933, and the annual leave with pay accumulated during the fiscal year 1934 will not be available until after June 30, 1934; and

Whereas under the provisions of existing law employees of the Government Printing Office are not now and never have been entitled to sick leave with pay; and

Whereas the effect of such section 103 of such legislative appropriation act of 1933 discriminates against employees of the Government Printing Office: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of section 103 of Title I of Part II of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1932, all employees of the Government Printing Office shall be granted during the fiscal year 1933 such leave with pay as was earned by them during the fiscal year 1932, and which has not been taken prior to July 1, 1932.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that at this point in my remarks there may be printed a letter explaining the purpose of the joint resolution. In order to save time, I will not ask to have the letter read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 26, 1932.

Hon. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Our conversation Saturday convinced me that your attention has not been called to the injustice the economy bill will have on the employees of the Government Printing Office. First, I wish to make clear the fact we do not oppose the furlough plan. We support it.

We are working under an agreement, authorized by Congress, with the Public Printer. Under that agreement we are to receive the prevailing scale of wages. From that amount we allow the Public Printer to hold back during the fiscal year enough pay to give us a 30-day vacation. These 30 days we can not take until the fiscal year is over; that is, we can not take last year's leave (our pay held back) until July 1 next. Under the economy bill we lose last year's leave, which is a confiscation of our wages. Other departments work seven hours a day and receive 30 days' sick leave beside their regular annual leave. Their sick and annual leave is so much extra money. We get no sick leave and pay for our own annual leave, work eight hours a day, and now have even that taken away.

This, Senator, is what we lose under the bill as it now stands:

30 days' leave, 1932	$260
30 days' leave, 1933	260
7 days' holidays, 1933	63
10 per cent night pay, 1933	320
	903

This with the overtime and enforced furlough in addition (cut in appropriation) will bring our loss to over $1,000, or a 35 per cent cut. What we particularly call unfair is the loss of last year's leave and that starting the fiscal year of 1934 our annual leave is cut to 15 days and loss of holidays. If we had sick leave as other departments have, we would not object, but in the bill no provision is made to give us a fair deal or treatment similar to other departments.

If the bill could be restored to read as it did in H. R. 11267, page 65, section 213, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 213. Hereafter no civilian officer or employee of the Government who receives both annual and sick leave with pay shall be granted leave of absence with pay in excess of 15 days, excluding Sundays and legal holidays"— it would give all a fair deal.

Do you know statistics prove the production in the Government Printing Office per employee is greater than in any other printing office in the United States? Yet we all sincerely like the Public Printer.

Yours truly,

RUDOLPH J. AKREN.

P. S.—I wish to call your attention also to section 103, page 51, H. R. 11267. This section should be amended to give us last year's leave. We heartily support the 5-day week with five and a half days' pay as the President recommended.

Do you know, Senator, that the Government Printing Office, Bureau of Engraving, and navy yard are the only departments working under the production plan?—R. J. A.

EMERGENCY HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION—AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT

Mr. GLASS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction with a view to increasing employment, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place insert the following:

"That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is hereby further amended by adding at the end of the second paragraph thereof a new paragraph, reading as follows:

"'In unusual and exigent circumstances the Federal Reserve Board, by the affirmative vote of not less than five members, may authorize any Federal reserve bank, during such periods as the said board may determine, at rates established, in accordance with the provisions of section 14, subdivision (d), of this act, to discount for any individual or corporation notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of the kinds and maturities made eligible for discount for member banks under other provisions of this act, when such notes, drafts, and bills of exchange are indorsed and otherwise secured to the satisfaction of the Federal reserve bank: Provided, That before discounting any such note, draft, or bill for an individual or corporation the Federal reserve bank shall obtain evidence that such individual or corporation is unable to secure adequate credit accommodations from other banking institutions. All such discounts for individuals or corporations shall be subject to such limitations, restrictions, and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe. No note, draft, or bill of exchange discounted under the provisions of this paragraph shall be eligible as collateral security for Federal reserve notes.'"

REPEAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT—MOTION TO DISCHARGE A COMMITTEE

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time simply to enter a motion for the discharge of the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 90) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States repealing the eighteenth amendment thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from New York will be entered.

USE OF RADIO FACILITIES FOR COMMERCIAL ADVERTISING PURPOSES

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, out of order, I ask leave to report a resolution from the Committee on Printing and request unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 270) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the letter of the chairman of the Federal Radio Commission dated June 9, 1932, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution No. 129, a report relative to the use of radio facilities for commercial advertising purposes, together with a list showing the educational institutions which have been licensed, be printed, with accompanying illustrations, as a Senate document.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 7939. An act to authorize the presentation of a distinguished-flying cross to Russell N. Boardman and John L. Polando, and Wiley Post and Harold Gatty, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10246. An act to fix the fees to be charged for the issue of domestic money orders;

H. R. 10494. An act to provide a postage charge on notices to publishers regarding undeliverable second-class matter; and

H. R. 12445. An act to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by providing for and expediting a public-works program.

DEFINITION OF INTOXICANTS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in connection with the difficulty which the Senators are having in finding out what is an intoxicant I have caused an investigation to be made so that at the next session of Congress when the Senators begin to consider what percentage of alcohol will intoxicate a human being they may begin with the fundamental fact as to when a human being is intoxicated. I have had a search made into that matter to ascertain fundamentally when one might be said to be intoxicated; so that having determined that fact all one has to do is to find out what he took to produce the effect.

In Mordecai's Law Lectures, Volume I, Chapter XXIII, page 742, is quoted a definition of drunkenness taken from the North Carolina Law Journal, which reads:

> Not drunk is he who from the floor
> Can rise again or drink once more:
> But drunk is he who prostrate lies
> And can not either drink or rise!

[Laughter.]

APPRAISERS OF MERCHANDISE AND SURVEYORS OF CUSTOMS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, at the request of the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] I ask that a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury may be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 8, 1932.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Upon perusal of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 1, it was noted that certain remarks made by several Senators with respect to the provision abolishing the positions of appraisers of merchandise and surveyors of customs, contained in the then pending Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill, were not in accordance with the actual situation. Consequently, the following comment is offered for your consideration:

The proposed legislation, which has since become law, abolished the offices of surveyors of customs (except the surveyor of customs at the port of New York) and appraisers of merchandise (except the appraiser of merchandise at the port of New York)—21 in all—with annual salaries aggregating $102,000.

In debate on this matter, several Senators took the viewpoint that the enactment of such legislation would result in losses to the Government. It was stated that all other cities would be at the mercy of the New York broker, due to the fact that the appraiser at that port would be retained, which would inevitably result in diverting all imported merchandise to the port of New York for customs clearance.

It was further stated that under the proposed plan when an appraiser makes an error the importer would have to go to the collector or to the comptroller to settle any disagreement. It is also stated in this respect that if there is no appraiser but a clerk who is a mere agent of the collector or comptroller, the importer knows that such clerk would not go to the collector or comptroller.

At this point is may be stated that reference to the comptroller was made rather inadvisedly since this officer is in no way concerned with the settlement of disputes relating to the appraisement of imported merchandise.

The department sees no reason to believe that imported merchandise will be diverted to the port of New York as the result of the legislation in question. The appraiser's stores will be maintained as heretofore and the work carried on in the same manner without any loss to the Government and will afford importers every convenience and privilege heretofore extended to them under the tariff act.

While appraisers of merchandise and acting appraisers will hereafter be placed under the jurisdiction of collectors of customs, this will in no way affect an importer's right to appeal from any appraisement that may be made. The same procedure followed in the past will be adhered to, and it will not be necessary, as stated in the debate upon this bill, for an importer to come to Washington to present his case.

In conclusion, I wish to reiterate that it is the department's firm conviction that the legislation as passed will in no way impair the efficiency of the Customs Service or endanger the revenue, nor will it deprive importers of any of their statutory rights under existing law.

Very truly yours,

SEYMOUR LOWMAN, Assistant Secretary.

MONTICELLO—HOME OF JEFFERSON

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a letter from the secretary of the Thomas Jefferson Foundation. They are having some difficulty in raising the needed money with which to complete the purchase of the fine property of Monticello. In this letter it is requested that an editorial by Claude G. Bowers in reference to Monticello be included in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO-DAY ALL PATRIOTS JOIN IN CELEBRATING MONTICELLO DAY IN HONOR OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF MONTICELLO, THE HOME OF THOMAS JEFFERSON, AS A NATIONAL MEMORIAL TO THE AUTHOR OF THE DECLARATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE AND AS A PATRIOTIC SHRINE FOR THE CHILDREN OF AMERICA

This is Monticello Day, in honor of the establishment of the beautiful home of Thomas Jefferson as a national shrine, sacred to the memory of the things he wrought.

As a boy he looked up to the hilltop and had a dream of the day when he could there build a home for his meditations.

To the building of that home he brought his own architectural genius, his perfect taste, and thus he planned one of the choicest examples of American architecture.

He put into that home the riches of his mind and heart, and there he took his bride and there were born his children.

Thence he was drawn afar to serve his fellow men in public station, and however far he wandered from its hearth his heart was always yearning for its beauty and serenity.

There in days of danger he planned the public safety, and there he organized the battles that he fought for democracy and the rights of the average man. There in critical moments he gathered about him some of the choice spirits of his time to devise ways and means of meeting the enemies of the things he thought essential to the prosperity of the people and the real stability of the state.

There he retired at times from the turmoil of the battle to regain his strength and invigorate his faith in the warmth of the love of his children, his neighbors, and his servants.

Thence went forth the letters on public policy that have become a rich heritage to all peoples striving for self-government.

There, his official service over, he retired to watch from the hilltop over the security of the fruits of the victories he had won and to receive for a quarter of a century the homage of the lovely and the great of this and other lands who made their sentimental pilgrimages to the shrine of his genius.

And there, poor in purse because of his hospitality but rich in spirit and in the love of a Nation, he passed to his reward.

Monticello is the mausoleum of the heart of Thomas Jefferson, and there his body is buried.

"Such graves as his are pilgrims' shrines,
Shrines to no creed or code confined,
The Delphian vales, the Palestines,
The Meccas of the mind."

FARM BOARD OPERATIONS—EDITORIAL FROM MINNEAPOLIS (MINN.) TRIBUNE

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the Minneapolis Tribune, on the front page of its issue of Friday, July 8, 1932, prints a very interesting article entitled "Time for the Farm Board to Act," which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TIME FOR THE FARM BOARD TO ACT

Making due allowances for the hazards that attend all agricultural enterprises, it appears to be reasonably certain that the Northwest will harvest a large wheat crop this year.

The price is disastrously low. The prospective yield at present prices justifies only moderate rejoicing. What might well be the turning point in the tide of depression can, with present prices, cause hardly more than a ripple in the dark waters.

The Nation as a whole, particularly the industrial East, is beginning to awaken to the fact that we can not escape the depression so long as the price of agricultural products remains at the present level. The price of wheat is the basic figure for agricultural products. The price of wheat not only affects the wheat grower but every other agricultural producer as well. That being the case, every farmer is benefited by the price of wheat, and inasmuch as the general depression is weighted down by the agricultural depression, the price of wheat has an industrial, commercial, and financial, as well as an agricultural, importance.

The Farm Board has probably not to exceed 75,000,000 bushels of wheat in the United States and in Canada. This wheat has its depressive effect on the present price. No one knows when the board will decide to sell it, and so long as this uncertainty lasts it will exist in competition with the on-coming crop.

The Farm Board could do the entire country a signal favor by impounding this wheat, for say, a year and a half, and announcing that it would not be sold until the Chicago price was at least 75 cents a bushel. Such an announcement would effectively remove from our domestic and exports needs 75,000,000 bushels until January, 1934, unless the price of wheat at Chicago reached 75 cents.

No other method of disposing of this wheat, except destruction, can do the farmer any good. Any other plan whereby the wheat goes into consumption may do the recipients good but not the farmer. The farmer can not be benefited by substituting the Farm Board's wheat for the farmer's wheat.

The Tribune can not see that a policy of impounding or sale at a fixed price will be any violation of the fundamental principles of the Farm Board. The board pegged or attempted to peg the price of wheat before and believes that it did the farmers a great service. If the effort to peg the price was justified when the board was bidding against the world, it is justified now in so far as its own wheat holdings are concerned.

It is not likely that a policy of impounding would occasion the Farm Board any extraordinary loss, except possibly that occasioned by storage charges. It is altogether probable that some time within a year and a half there will be a sufficient shortage of wheat somewhere in the world to allow the board to dispose of its holdings without depressing the market.

The American wheat grower needs a higher price for his crop. The Nation desperately needs higher prices for all its commodities. The Farm Board can stimulate prices by withdrawing its wheat holdings from the market. The Tribune believes that it should do so at once.

EX-CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER CHURCHILL'S SPEECH ON GOLD

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD extracts from a speech by Mr. Winston Churchill, formerly Chancellor of the Exchequer, delivered before the Royal Empire Society and appearing in the New York Times of Sunday, the 10th instant.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHURCHILL LAYS ILLS OF WORLD TO GOLD—EX-CHANCELLOR OF EXCHEQUER ASSERTS CORNERING OF METAL HAS SABOTAGED HUMAN EFFORT—PUTS HOPES IN CONFERENCE—OPPORTUNITY IS SEEN TO ARREST REMORSELESS DEFLATION AND RESTORE COMMODITY VALUES

Subjoined is the text, as quoted in the London newspapers, of Winston Churchill's speech on gold, delivered at a gathering of the Royal Empire Society. Another ex-Chancellor of Exchequer also attended the function. He was Sir Robert Horn, who expressed the opinion that the best solution of the monetary problem was to unite silver with gold as the basis upon which the world's business might be conducted.

Mr. Churchill said:

"We meet here to-day in the heart of the city of London because our weights and measures have been tampered with. They have been twisted and distorted in a manner most unfair and most injurious. Gold has been cornered, scrambled for, and hoarded. It has risen enormously in price, and the value of everything we have or earn has been diminished accordingly.

"In the last few years the price of gold has risen by nearly 70 per cent, and the value of everything else has fallen in like degree. We know that the fault lies with gold or with those who have manipulated gold. It does not lie with the many thousands of other commodities which are measured by gold.

"The remarkable feature of the last 10 years has been the way in which the prices of all these thousands of commodities have kept a steady relation with one another. They have marched forward together in an orderly array; indeed, they have actually closed their ranks. One commodity alone—gold—has broken from the ranks and has been raised to a pinnacle.

EVILS ASCRIBED TO GOLD

"Since gold is at present our supreme measure, all the rest have been cast down. This is the cause which has stilled the traffic on our railways, put out the blast furnaces, quenched enterprise, thrown millions of men out of employment in every land, and many millions more on short time. This is what has sabotaged every form of human effort and has depreciated every service which man can render to man. Should this process continue, every institution will be, if it is not already, threatened with insolvency or repudiation.

"The only things that have not been cut down are debts, scrip, expenditure, and fixed charges of all kinds. These have been by the same process—the debts at any rate—nearly doubled in weight and burden. Debtors everywhere, through the rise in gold, are being required to pay 70 per cent more than they were expected to pay a few years ago.

"This monstrous process has only to be continued long enough to shatter civilization as we have known it and as it has shattered the prosperity we have recently enjoyed.

"The odd thing about this cornering of gold is that no class and no country has benefited from it. The destruction of the monetary system of the world has come upon us like a blight and a pestilence, without any human design behind it. All creditors, whether national or individual, will, if this goes on, everywhere be faced increasingly with the insolvency of their debtors. Already the world is breaking out in moratoriums. Nations which played the principal part in cornering gold are suffering as much as those which—like ourselves—have never tried to impound the long-accepted world currency.

"No one has benefited. The creditor and the rentier, who see themselves faced with having to make accommodations to their debtors; the honest debtor, national or individual, who offers the same value of commodities to redeem his scrip as before; the unemployed workman queueing up at the labor exchange—all have suffered from the same evil cause.

ASSAILS 'MORBID DELUSION'

"There is a race of men in every country who go about saying everything is quite all right. According to these wiseacres, we are in want because we are too clever in making the things we want. So much food has been grown that many must starve, and those who grow the food must be ruined. We are taught to pray for bad harvests as if they were a blessing from God. I ask you to join with me in rejecting this morbid delusion.

"Time is short. The tension of the world increases. We can see the internal stresses to which various nations are subjected, from China to Peru, or perhaps it would be more apposite to say from Japan to Chile. Assassinations, revolutions, refusals to meet contractual obligations—universal bewilderment and distress. These are, for a large part of the world, including gold-hoarding nations, the order of the day.

"A conference is now being held at Lausanne to put war debts and reparations into cold storage, where their sinister microbes will be killed forever.

"Let me tell you something which has not been said before by national statesmen or capable editors. War debts caused the gold disease, but cancellation or suspension of war debts and reparations, although obviously necessary and, indeed, imperative, will not now stop the disease which has been started.

"To find the cure we must do something quite different from the simple adjusting of war debts and reparations. We must do something far beyond anything that may be achieved by the conference at Lausanne, and that is why I am so glad that his Majesty's Government has favored the plans which I impressed upon it in September of last year of a world conference upon the money problem in order to arrest this remorseless deflation still in progress and to revaluate commodities up to the normal level of prosperity.

COOPERATION OF AMERICA

"The United States has shown itself willing to come to this monetary conference. There is every reason to believe that once it is known that the British Empire and the United States are laying their heads together upon the money problem the other great financial powers of the world will demand inclusion in their conclave.

"The United States will not come if debts or reparations are included in the agenda; many nations will not come if tariffs or quotas are included. We shall risk much if we become too ambitious, but the status of silver as a monetary factor should be included.

"There is but one salvation—to grasp this monetary lever with the combined authority of the greatest nations of the world, and you will have the best chance now open of reviving the boundless energies of men and opening once again a broadening field of prosperity and progress to the toilers, the builders, and the thinkers of all nations."

INCOME FROM COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND SURVEYS DISCLOSURES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 264), submitted by Mr. NYE on July 8, 1932, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation be, and it hereby is, requested to secure from the Secretary of the Treasury and submit to the two Houses of Congress at the earliest practicable time full and complete information concerning any and all taxes and penalties which have been collected by or paid into the Treasury consequent upon disclosures made before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the Senate in the course of the investigation conducted by it pursuant to Senate Resolution 101, Seventieth Congress, first session, or through inquiries prosecuted incidental to such investigation, including the date of payments, the amount of the same, and the persons making the payments; and likewise, in so far as it may not be incompatible with the public interest, further information concerning any claims or demands being made by the Treasury against any persons or corporations for taxes or penalties over and above such sums as may have been heretofore paid on account of the receipt of assets so disclosed and not duly reported for taxation as required by law.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, when this resolution was submitted on Friday last, I objected to its consideration and asked that it go over for a day. After considering the matter and hearing the explanation of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], the author of the resolution, who seeks information in connection with an investigation conducted by his committee, I have no objection to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

LOANS MADE BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate, Senate Resolution 269, coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 269), submitted by Mr. COUZENS, July 8 (calendar day, July 9), 1932, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there is hereby created a select committee of the Senate to be appointed by the Vice President, consisting of five Senators, not more than three of whom shall be chosen from one political party, which committee shall be authorized and directed to investigate the loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and to ascertain any information or facts concerning such loans which the committee deems advisable that the Senate should have. The committee shall make a report to the Senate at the first meeting of the Senate in January of 1933, and shall also make such recommendations as the committee deems advisable.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senate knows that there has been a great deal of discussion in the press with respect to loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to banks, trust companies, railroads, and other organizations. So far as railroad loans are concerned, I have personally followed each loan that has been made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, to the best of my knowledge, the railroad loans are the only ones as to which the public has information concerning the class of securities deposited, the purposes for which the loans have been made, and the conditions contingent upon securing the loans. There has been considerable press discussion and private discussion, and discussion privately in the Senate, with respect to a loan of some $80,000,000 said to have been made to a bank in Chicago. There is, in my judgment, considerable unrest in respect to the type of loans and the security that is being put up for the loans aggregating $1,000,000,000 already made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In view of the circumstances, it occurred to me that a Senate committee might examine the records and see whether the loans were being made in accordance with the law and that they were adequately secured.

I therefore offered the resolution, and I did so following the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which resolution I thought was, in some respects at least, unfair, in view of the fact that the Senate refused to adopt an amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] making all the records of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation public property. The Congress refused to adopt that policy; and since the organization of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in the case of all loans which have been made, the borrowers have proceeded with their applications and have put up their securities with the understanding under the law itself that the records were not public. Therefore I think it is unfair to open up all these records for publication after Congress has in the enactment of the statute said that they would be private and confidential.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no objection to this resolution, although I realize that if it shall be adopted it will be used as the chief argument against the adoption of the resolution which I have introduced and which is now on the calendar providing for a full report in detail of all transactions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I was under the impression when the Senator from Michigan prepared his resolution, which is now pending, that he intended to offer it as an amendment to the resolution which I had introduced. I had no objection to that course, and I am not now going to oppose the adoption of the pending resolution as a separate proposition, although I realize, as I have said, that its adoption will probably mean, at least at this session of Congress, to prevent the consideration of the resolution submitted by me.

I know that when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act was passed the Senate voted down a proposition to make its transactions public; but I do not believe that action can be logically used as an argument against the publicity of all the transactions, which are really governmental transactions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. When we passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act I think we made a mistake in not putting in it a publicity provision, but, regardless of that, we did not know then what we now know, at least in part. I myself can not see how any legitimate institution is going to be injured by making public the fact that it has borrowed money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which, in effect, is borrowing money from the Government of the United States.

I think I told the Senate when we were discussing my resolution on a prior occasion that I had personal knowledge of an attempt in my State of several banks that desired to borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation but hesitated about doing so because they feared that publicity of the fact might injure them. I took up the question with Mr. Dawes, who was then chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. A committee representing these banks were here; they had articles of incorporation already prepared which they submitted to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and which they intended to file, if such procedure met with the approval of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and then the new corporation thus created would have proceeded to borrow the money and in turn the money would have been turned over to the banks, the security being put up by the banks, which in reality were getting the money. They made no secret of the fact that the banks were to get the money. I had no personal knowledge of it, but they were ready to submit their securities and were able to show that the securities they had to offer were ample and would justify a loan. I thought there might be something in their contention as to publicity, but I was convinced by Mr. Dawes himself that there was nothing in the suggestion that publicity would injure a bank which had borrowed money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

It is known that under the law the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will not loan money to a bank that is insolvent. The real idea was to loan money to banks that were perfectly solvent but whose securities were, to use the ordinary term, "frozen," in other words, they were not liquid and on them the banks were not able to get cash on the instant. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, of course, would not loan to a bank unless after examination they were convinced that the bank was solvent and there was no risk in loaning money. I believe that is a fair statement, assuming that they would do their duty—and that is what I do assume—and would not make a loan to an insolvent bank on any kind of security. They would not be justified under the law making such a loan. I assume they have made no such loans, and that in every case where they have loaned money the bank was able to put up security that was ample and sufficient to make the loan good.

The people who have money deposited in banks know that; and I had called to my attention a particular instance of a bank in one of the States of the Union where there was a continual and systematic withdrawal of funds by depositors, where the end was in sight, they would be unable to pay their depositors and would have to close the bank. The bank was solvent. Its securities were good, although they were not liquid at the time. They borrowed money of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The community knew it. They gave publicity to it, and the run on the bank stopped instantly. The people who had money there realized that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would not have loaned to an insolvent bank, and that the funds of the Government itself were behind the bank, and hence fear was dissipated at once; and I believe that publicity would have that effect everywhere.

When the depositors of a bank knew that the Government was behind the bank, that would end all possibility of a run on the bank. It would at once reestablish confidence in the financial stability of the bank. It did that with Mr. Dawes's bank in Chicago. The run ceased at once when it was known in Chicago that the bank had borrowed money of the Government of the United States.

So as a matter of fact, in my judgment, the passage of the resolution that I have introduced would be a good thing. It would help to restore confidence in hundreds of banks if people knew that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, through its experts, had passed on the assets of the bank and had found the assets good and ample and then loaned money to it; and for the same reason they would expect them to loan additional money to save a bank that they had started out to protect and to save.

So that I have no fear in that regard. I think it is an unjustified fear. Not only do I think the statement that publicity in these transactions would injure legitimate banking institutions is groundless, but I think publicity would help all such institutions.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I had no idea, in offering the resolution, of injuring any bank. I would not do that under any circumstances; but this is a public corporation, organized under a law of the United States, handling funds that belong to the taxpayers of the United States, and we are concealing from the taxpayers the use to which their money has been put.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield after a while.

That is not all, Mr. President. The truth is that by the use of the money for the purposes provided for in the act which established the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, we have to the extent of the use of public funds by that corporation drained the Treasury of the United States; and that argument is used continually, and I think justifiably, when any other appropriation by Congress is asked for. "We have not the money," we say. We have used the cash and the credit of the United States Government to the amount of $2,000,000,000 in the establishment of this corporation, all public money, all public credit; and it seems to me it is an outrage to conceal from the owners of the money, the taxpayers of the country, just what has been done with it.

I only rose to express my idea about the matter. I think the resolution of the Senator from Michigan will have a good effect; but, in my judgment, it does not go as far as it ought to go, and will not give the benefit that real publicity to all public business would give.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut. I will say to the Senator that I do not want to take up any more time than necessary, because I do not want to interfere with the passage of this resolution.

Mr. WALCOTT. I rose to correct what I believe is an inaccurate statement on the part of the Senator from Nebraska.

He made the statement, as I understand, that these loans could not be made to a bank that was insolvent. That is not accurate, because the law was intended to relieve banks that were more or less on the edge of insolvency, and in many cases banks that actually, under the strict interpretation of the law as laid down by the comptroller, are insolvent.

Therein lies the danger of making public any statements with reference to the loans either promised or contemplated to these banks that are in a weakened condition. Otherwise, as the Senator says, it would be entirely safe and unobjectionable; but where it is well known by the public that a bank may be in danger that is receiving money as a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, many times it becomes terrifying to the community in which the bank is located, and might easily start runs on many banks.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no quarrel with anyone who believes that, but I do not believe that such a result would take place. In my judgment, the reverse is true. Moreover, every one of these banks will have to make a statement under the law, and I presume they will have to show their indebtedness to this corporation for all the money that they borrow from it. I do not believe it is the theory of this law to loan to insolvent banks, although a difference might arise in the definition of insolvency. It may be that technically a bank which is unable to pay, at the instant, the demands of its depositors, in a technical sense would be classed by the comptroller as insolvent. If that is what insolvency means, then they were not going to loan any money to any banks that were not insolvent. There would be no use in loaning money to a bank if it did not need it.

I take it that a bank that has securities in its portfolio that on examination are good, ample in amount to pay the depositors, but which securities, on account of this terrible depression, can not be turned into money, is the kind of a bank, and the only kind of a bank, to which the corporation would be justified in loaning money.

I realize that I could offer my resolution as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan, just as he intended originally to offer his as an amendment to mine. However, I doubt the wisdom of doing it, because it might lead, and probably would lead, to a discussion that would take it over, and bring about the failure of the passage of any resolution, because under the parliamentary rule under which we are working this resolution will have to be acted on before 2 o'clock or it will go to the calendar.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I think that if times were normal, the statements made by the Senator from Nebraska in regard to the effect of his resolution would be correct. Times are not normal, however.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we would not have any Reconstruction Finance Corporation if times were normal.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course they are not normal.

Mr. WATSON. But ordinarily if a bank borrowed money, there would not be much thought about it.

The Senator says—and in a sense it is true—that where a wisely managed concern like the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would lend money to a bank, that would be proof positive to the people in the community round about that the bank must be in a pretty sound condition or else they could not borrow the money.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator remembers, does he not—it was so stated in the newspapers—that when the $80,000,000 was loaned to Mr. Dawes's bank, he immediately gave publicity to the fact?

Mr. WATSON. He did.

Mr. NORRIS. And from that time on there has not been any question about the depositors demanding their money. No run has taken place. Everything of that kind has ceased.

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true. He gave publicity to the fact that he had received this money, and that for every dollar the bank owed there was a dollar in the bank to pay it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, that kind of a statement might not be made by every bank that gets money. I do not know; but I was taking the Senator's side for a moment, looking at it from that viewpoint—that ordinarily if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would let a bank have money, the people round about would generally take it for granted that the bank was in a fairly sound condition, or else it could not have gotten the money. I am assuming, however, that a different atmosphere prevails now, or, as we say in modern parlance, a different psychology, and that the very minute it is known that a bank is borrowing money and receives money, that very minute there goes throughout that community the feeling that the bank is unsound and unsafe, and the people rush in to get their money, being fearful of its safety in the days to come.

My own belief has been, as I said to the Senator privately—that is what made me afraid of it—that it might result in runs on a very great many banks in the country that otherwise would not occur. I have believed that to be true; and, if that should result, it would be a fearful situation. Otherwise, I should have no objection to the investigation; and I want to say this about the Senator's resolution further:

My understanding is that his resolution refers not only to the past but to the future; that is to say, it calls for a statement of all the loans already made, with a meticulous statement of all of the details respecting the loans and the commitments for the future. I assume that if it were given out that commitments were made to a bank where the money had not actually been paid, and that got around in the community, it would close that bank almost inevitably. The commitments for the future I think would be a very dangerous thing to include in the Senator's resolution under existing conditions in the country.

That is why I have not thought it wise to favor the Senator's resolution. Of course, I have had no opportunity at all to look into the resolution of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know whether it was contemplated, under the Senator's resolution, that this publicity should be made not only with respect to transactions actually closed but also as to what applications have been made and rejected. I can see that if a bank had applied for a loan and it had been rejected——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there was nothing of that kind in the resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well. That part of it, then, has not any bearing; but the resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan does not contemplate any reports at all now, as I understand.

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, I should like to ask him a question. If the Couzens resolution be passed, will the Senator from Nebraska still urge the passage of his resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say frankly to the Senator that I can not answer that question at the present time. If I were satisfied that I would, I would offer it right now as an amendment; but, as I said, I do not intend to do that.

If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Indiana has said a few things that it seems to me I ought to reply to.

I am not finding fault with anybody who has fear that publicity would injure conditions. I think they are entirely wrong. But I do realize that when the country can hear from the debates which take place in the Senate that grave and reverend Senators have said, "Publicity would bring runs on banks and bankrupt us and put us in a terrible condition," that kind of statement going out over the country, even though honestly made, would have a bad effect. I think that is the only thing that would have a bad effect.

I am assuming that Senators are making their objections in the best of faith, but if they were made in any other way, they could not have a worse effect; and that is the only thing about it I am afraid of. When people read the newspapers and hear that Senators of national reputation have said in the Senate that if this is passed it will create a fear and a run on a bank, that very statement may have that effect with some people.

My resolution calls for a statement as to commitments made; that is, promises now made to make loans. I think such things ought to be given publicity. However, if that is objectionable, there is no reason why that should not be stricken out of the resolution. It is an entirely separate paragraph, and could easily be stricken out.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. In further comment on that statement, it would seem to me that the announcement that these banks had received support from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation ought to create confidence, rather than fear.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I have said. I think it would create confidence.

Mr. DILL. The fact that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has come to their support would rather tend to make people think they were safe.

Mr. NORRIS. The only possible injury to banks would come to those which have not received any of the money.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, we have confined our discussion entirely to banks. There are other financial institutions in the country which might be embarrassed by publicity at this time.

I take the position that the act creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation provided a nonpolitical body, and from my personal knowledge and acquaintance with the appointees, three of whom come from the minority side, upon the recommendation of the minority, they have proven to have been splendid selections. All of those gentlemen are of unquestioned integrity and ability. This is an emergency, these people are doing the best they can in a most difficult situation, and should not be hampered.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, not having had time to investigate this matter, I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution has gone over previously.

Mr. WATSON. Has it gone over?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It went over one day under the rule.

Mr. COUZENS. The resolution is entitled to be voted on, and I want a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, it is well known that during all of the debates over making public the records of the income-tax returns and corporation returns in the Bureau of Internal Revenue I have been in favor of making them public records. I was in favor of making the records of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation public records when we enacted the law creating that corporation. I am in entire agreement with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that these should be public records. But I believe that we have operated under a different policy, notwithstanding the views of the Senator from Nebraska and myself in respect to these being public records, and now to make the law retroactive it seems to me would not be exactly fair. I am not charging the Senator from Nebraska with being unfair; I am just pointing out that it seems to me there is a difference between making a law effective in the future and making it retroactively effective.

This proposal of mine was introduced following the resolution introduced by the Senator from Nebraska, and it is true that I said to the Senator that I would offer it as an amendment to his resolution. But it was afterwards pointed out to me, in discussion with Senators privately, that we had at one time turned down, by a substantial vote, a resolution to make these records public, and afterwards I spoke to the Senator about it and said that I thought the resolution ought to be introduced separately, because of that angle to the matter.

So far as I am concerned, I have no urgent feeling about having this resolution passed, but I do think that it is not only to the interest of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation but to the interest of the public that a congressional body should look over the records of that corporation and be able to assure the public that they have done a proper job.

It has been my good fortune to be in touch with one or two of the directors of the Reconstructiton Finance Corporation, and to have been consulted with respect to some of the loans they have had in contemplation, and from my own knowledge of those cases I have no reason to doubt that the loans they have made have been proper loans. I am not raising any question about the propriety of the loans they have already made. Nor am I raising any question about the adequacy of the security.

I may say that there is one exception to that, and that is that I do not know sufficiently about the great loan of $80,000,000 made to a Chicago bank. That appears, from what I can find out, to be the largest of all the loans made. I do not know whether such a large loan to one institution is justified, nor do I know the type of security that has been placed behind that loan.

The statement of the Senator from Nebraska, that where a bank which has to borrow and is able to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation public confidence will be given to that institution, meets with some doubt in my mind as to its accuracy. For instance, out of five banks in a medium-sized city of 100,000 to 150,000 population, we may find that four of them are not borrowing from the Government, are not in need of borrowing, but that the fifth is in such a condition that it has to borrow. Undoubtedly the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in making a loan to a bank, demands a very great deal of security, which obviously weakens the other creditors of the bank, weakens the depositors. It weakens all other creditors whenever a bank has to take out of its portfolio securities to guarantee a Reconstruction Finance Corporation loan. Therefore, I believe that if in a community such as I have described four banks were found not to need any money, and one was found to need money, the action would be unfavorable to the bank that needed the money.

I think the passage of this resolution would be an assurance to the Senate and to the public that there was some agency belonging to the Government, an elective agency, which has observation over the conduct of this corporation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it seems to me that two totally different questions are raised by the resolution submitted by my able colleague the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] and the resolution submitted by the able senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. It seems to me the resolution submitted by my colleague raises solely the question of the congressional responsibility to the country for our inevitably continuing relationship to the expenditure and management of large public funds. So far as I am concerned, I can see no possible objection to a proposal which keeps the Senate more intimately in touch with this responsibility. On the contrary, I can see many essential reasons why that responsibility should be maintained in precisely the relationship which the pending resolution proposes. I can see reasons why the Reconstruction Finance Corporation might welcome this new opportunity to report and to confer more intimately upon its highly vital labors.

On the other hand, Mr. President, I am bound to say that I profoundly disagree with the analysis of the Senator from Nebraska respecting the advisability of pursuing the thing still farther, and pursuing it, as I see it, unnecessarily, after we have established this point of contact between the Senate and the corporation. I disagree that wholesale publicity for these fiduciary relationships would be useful. On the contrary, I feel that elementary prudence requires that their confidential character be respected. We can make all necessary inquiry in behalf of the public welfare through the agency of this proposed committee. I favor it. But we defeat this same public welfare if we make these fiduciary relationships a matter of common advertising and gossip and thus too often a matter of illegitimate popular speculation and of unwarranted hysterical suspicion. We would tear down the very edifice which we have sought to erect.

Repeated reference has been made to a recent widely discussed Chicago bank situation. There is an excellent example of the precise thing I have in mind. Because this great bank fortunately was able to mobilize additional resources to a point where it was able to announce to the public that it had dollar for dollar in cash for its depositors in its strong box, of course the publicity was inavaluable and achieved an inestimably effective and immediate result. But if the announcement had been that they had only half enough money in cash to pay all their depositors, the effect of the announcement would have been precisely to the contrary. The announcement would have been absolutely fatal. It would have invited and stimulated the precise debacle which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is organized to prevent.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. What does the Senator think, then, about the policy, if that be the policy, that in a favored case they will lend enough money to pay all the depositors, and in a case that is not so favored the bank will get only half enough money to pay the depositors? Should not the country know whether that is the policy of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or not?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, I do not know that such policy has been pursued. I quite agree that there should be no favorites whatever in the administration of the corporation. I should be very much interested in having the Senate committee which this resolution proposes to raise find out what the facts are; and if the facts require a submission to the Senate, that can follow.

I am assuming that the loan to this particular bank was upon the same sound type of basis which the corporation is willing to pursue in its loans to all banks. I am saying that in this particular instance resources from other additional sources apparently were available which made it possible to announce that 100 cents on the dollar in cash were in the bank's vaults to cover all its deposits. Such an announcement, I repeat, is inestimable in its value and is bound to be conclusive. Equally, it is unique. But, as the Senator from Nebraska well knows, in the normal credit operations of the banks of the country there is not one case in a thousand where it would be possible to announce, even after a loan by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, that 100 cents on the dollar in cash were in the bank for the purpose of meeting the depositor demands. This is no reflection on these banks. On the contrary, if all the banks in the country were to keep themselves wholly liquid, and all their loans in condition for immediate cash conversion, there would be no banking service ever rendered to the industrial, commercial, and agricultural borrowers of the country upon whom the resurgence of trade depends. It would not be banking. It would be unadulterated hoarding. The Chicago instance was as unusual as it was fortunate. Such a status, however, in the very nature of things can not be the ordinary rule.

Mr. NORRIS. That is just what I am getting at with my resolution. With full publicity, that kind of a thing would not occur.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What kind of a thing?

Mr. NORRIS. That they would take one bank and give it enough money so that it would have in its vaults enough money to pay all the depositors, and not do that with some other bank. That would be a favoritism which nobody would stand for.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is assuming that in this instance the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was the source of all the funds sufficient to make that 100 per cent announcement possible. I do not believe that is the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, the publicity announcement made was that practically that much was subscribed and loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, $80,000,000, $10,000,000 from another source, and $5,000,000 from another, making $95,000,0000, which equaled the deposits. Both of us are assuming; I do not know that those things are true, but I have taken the Senator's assumption that this announcement that they had a hundred cents on the dollar to pay depositors would satisfy everybody, of course. They would not have been able to make that announcement—assuming that to be true—had it not been for the enormous loans they got of public funds, and why should one bank get public funds so as to be able to make an announcement like that, and not others?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Apparently I am having difficulty in making myself understood to the Senator. I agree with the Senator that there should be no different rule with respect to one bank and another; but I am not conceding because neither the Senator from Nebraska nor I have the specific facts at hand, that the result in this particular Chicago instance was solely due to the loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

On the contrary, I have been given to understand that a very substantial portion of the liquidity came from other sources. But be that as it may, the point I am making—and I think it is incontrovertible—is that in only the rarest case would it ever be possible for the announcement to be made that a hundred cents on the dollar in cash was in the bank for the purpose of liquidating the deposits and, therefore, only in the rarest case would publicity be helpful. Except as it could be possible to make that specific, categorical, and complete announcement, I insist that publicity would be fatal and that it would checkmate and offset the precise thing, namely, public confidence, which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act undertakes to serve. Let us either abandon the whole reconstruction adventure or let us withhold nullifying devices.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In just a moment. It is with a complete feeling of desire to keep our own responsibility intact that I subscribe to the thoroughly practical resolution submitted by my colleague, and it is with a feeling that to go further would subvert the very purpose that we are seeking to serve, that I am in opposition to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

I yield now to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. According to the resolution we would have five Senators who would know about what is going on, and that is all the Senate would know about it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As I understand the resolution it is to clothe the committee with responsibility to report back to the Senate if it finds any untoward situation which requires full Senate consideration. This is ample protection.

Mr. NORRIS. But they report next January.

Mr. LONG. The point I am making is that I would just as soon trust the members of the board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as any five men we are going to pick here, so far as that is concerned. I would just as soon trust them as anybody picked out by the Senate. If we are going to make this matter public, this half hatched-up plan is not going to do any good to anybody. Let us either make it public or not make it public.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In just a moment I shall be very glad to yield. Let me agree with the Senator from Louisiana in one respect. So far as I am concerned I also fully trust the membership of the board of directors of the corporation, just as much as I would trust a concurrent Senate committee.

Mr. LONG. Not all of them.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I believe absolutely in the integrity of the administration of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation so far as I have been able to see it operated, but I think there is an inevitable value in this concurrent checking on the part of the legislative branch of the Government which inevitably continues to be in partnership with the adventure.

I yield now to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that the resolution does not interfere at all with the requirement that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall make a report quarterly. Under section 15 of the act the corporation is required to make a quarterly report to the Congress, stating the character of loans, the number of borrowers in each State, and so forth. The resolution does not interfere with that at all.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not want to continue the debate, because certainly my purpose is not one of preventing a vote. I simply wanted to make clear why I find myself in disagreement at the moment with the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska, and why on the other hand I find myself cordially in sympathy with the resolution submitted by my colleague.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KEAN. The vote was taken before the debate took place but the Chair has not announced the result?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair never announces the result of a vote if a Senator rises before the announcement is made and desires to speak on the pending subject. That is the practice.

Mr. KEAN. Then is it the fact that we have had no vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The result was not announced and, therefore, there was no vote.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understood the resolution of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] was to be appended as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I have not read the resolution of the Senator from Michigan, except in the press. As I understand it, the purpose of the resolution is merely to appoint five confidential Senators, who are to sit in and get the information. Of course, naturally my friend from Michigan, being the author of the resolution, will be one of the lucky five. I assume that has been the practice here. If I were the author of the resolution I would like to sit in there myself. I would like to be one of the five picked. But I have a circumstantial suspicion that I probably may not get to be one of the chosen five to sit on the inside of the chicken coop, and so I am opposed to the resolution. [Laughter.] It ought to be provided either that 96 Senators are to be allowed to take a peek in on the situation or none of them ought to be allowed to go in and be the preferred chosen few.

We are all politicians. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], of course, will say he is not, but he is more lucky than all the balance of us. He is about the most fortunate politician I know of. He is one of the few rich men who has a popular appeal in this country. I would vote for him myself if I lived in Michigan. But if we are going to pick out five of us, naturally our friends in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are not going to be badly treated. Put me in there with the five men to be chosen on the committee and I will guarantee that I will get my part for my section of the country. Put any other man in there with these five and that will be the case. I am appealing to those of us who think we are not going to get on the committee not to stifle the thing by putting a plaster over the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska, but to provide something that will give us all a look-in, all of us here in the Senate as well as 120,000,000 people on the outside. It may be we can not get votes enough to pass the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska, but the resolution of the Senator from Michigan is no substitute. It is, indeed, directly opposite to what we are trying to get. It is to give five more men in confidence the information which the public ought to have, or else we have no business having five Senators sitting in there to report next January. It is rather like picking out a jury now to try a case next fall.

I am opposed to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan. It ought not to be passed. It is no substitute for the resolution that is offered by the Senator from Nebraska. It can not possibly do any good. It gives an unfair preference to 5 Senators over the other 91 Senators. If all of us are not entitled to the information, then I am not in favor of any select five Senators being given that right. I think the resolution ought to be voted down by both sides. Those who favor a public investigation ought to vote against it. Those who have confidence in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and do not want to give this information to the public, ought to vote against five Senators going in there without the balance of us going in, too, and having the advantage of the information. I think the resolution ought to be voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently said: Under the authority of Senate Resolution 269, agreed to this morning, the Chair names as the committee therein authorized the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 268) to amend subdivision (c) of section 4 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, was announced as first in order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, where is the clerk beginning the call of the calendar?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the call begins with the first bill on the calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2642) to establish a commission to be known as a Commission on a National Museum of Engineering and Industry was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1856) to provide for the relief of farmers in any State by the making of loans to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation, and/or similar districts other than Federal reclamation projects, or to counties, boards of supervisors, and/or other political subdivisions and legal entities, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. What became of Calendar 109, the first bill on the calendar?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It went over on objection. The clerk will state the next order of business on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 166) to print the pamphlets entitled "Draft of Mooney-Billings Report" and "Appendix Containing Official Documents" was announced as next in order.

Mr. FESS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3696) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3377) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction with a view to increasing employment was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 15) to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of the Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama, to authorize the letting of the Muscle Shoals properties under certain conditions, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. METCALF. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 572) to provide that the United States shall cooperate with the States in promoting the general health of the rural population of the United States and the welfare and hygiene of mothers and children was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1058) repealing various provisions of the act of June 15, 1917, entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," (40 Stat. L. 217), was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

FAIR TRADE—CHAIN STORES

The bill (S. 97) to protect trade-mark owners, distributors, and the public against injurious and uneconomic practices in the distribution of articles of standard quality under a distinguishing trade-mark, brand, or name was announced as next in order.

Mr. FESS. Let the bill go over.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold his objection for a moment I would like to say that there is widespread interest throughout the business world and a general demand for action on this measure.

This is shown by the thousands of petitions that have come to us in the past few months from independent business men and various groups of producers, distributors, and consumers asking for prompt enactment of Senate bill 97, commonly known as the fair trade bill.

This measure, which would restore freedom of contract between manufacturer and merchant, a freedom taken away by a Supreme Court opinion several years ago, to my mind is one of the relief measures the Congress should consider and enact. It deals with one of the fundamental causes of the present deplorable condition.

I realize with regret there is no chance of action in the Senate at this session of Congress. I just want to say right now, however, that I shall insist to the limit of my abilities for action when the Congress meets next December. The people of this country, the independent merchants of this country, are entitled to protection from predatory price cutting that is and was even before this depression started eliminating independent merchants, the backbone of merchandising prosperity in this Nation.

Destructive, predatory price cutting is one of the things bringing destruction upon our country. Nearly every standard brand of article is being retailed for predatory price-cutting purposes for less than the independent honest merchant can buy it at wholesale. This bill, S. 97, is not an anti-big-business bill. It only restores the freedom of contract, which is lawful in nearly every civilized country.

But I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate discussing the merits of this measure at this time. As I said before, I realize it is impossible under the present parliamentary situation to get real consideration at this session. I renew my statement, I intend to insist upon its consideration early next session.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as we look back over the period since November, 1929, and witness the efforts that have been made to revive business, employment, and prices, and with what results, it must come home to each of us that there is a lesson that the Nation must learn as to where our greatest reliance can be placed in such an emergency.

Not to the so-called leaders of industry and finance, to whom we had come to look as the source of all wisdom in practical affairs, can we turn for guidance. It is a question whether their performances are not largely responsible for our dilemma.

But there is solid satisfaction in the part which the ordinary business man has taken in these trying times. Except for that we would have fared far worse.

Amidst all the turmoil it is the small man who has kept his head. It is our neighbor—the retail merchant—who has stood in the breach and provided sorely needed merchandise on credit to his customers when our great institutions were frantically forcing collections, calling loans, and laying off employees. If we would know who it is that has conducted our community chests across the country and subscribed largely of what went into them for the relief of the distressed, go into any town in your State and look over the roster. We will be struck by the fact that it reads like a directory of local retail stores. It is this same class which has furnished more nearly the normal taxes than any other section of the business community.

It is to the legion of ordinary business men for their sanity and courage in times when their "betters" were in retreat that our hats may well be lifted. And their service and needs should not be forgotten by their country.

I pray for a long life, but I pray that I shall never see the day when great corporate middlemen shall have displaced the individual merchants. These are they who have always constituted the economic backbone of our towns and cities.

There are still 1,300,000 independent retailers in business. If we would speed the stocking of their shelves, the stimulation of their confidence, let us strike off the shackles of unfair competition which discourage hope in any man. Over a million men who have already proved their mettle will give fresh impetus to the whole field of trade and industry if we show recognition of their needs.

The great among us have failed us in this time of need. Now let us give the common man a chance to show what he can do in the mass. Remember that 98 per cent of retail merchants, over 1,250,000, are represented by the organizations which have petitioned for the passage of the Capper-Kelly bill.

Let us join in responding to the need pointed out in the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes in the Miles case. We can do this by passing a statute that will give the average business man a chance to show what can be done to start orders by the million rolling into our factories.

As I see it, we should join in giving S. 97 early consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILLS PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish equipment, goods, and supplies to governors and acting governors for use in aid of distressed citizens was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1039) establishing additional land offices in the States of Montana, Oregon, South Dakota, Idaho, New Mexico, Colorado, and Nevada was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLAINE. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1251) relating to the making of loans to veterans upon their adjusted-service certificates was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, we passed a measure the other day taking care of this matter temporarily, so I ask that the bill may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection the bill goes over.

The bill (S. 34) to provide for review of the action of consular officers in refusing immigration visas was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 939) to limit the jurisdiction of district courts of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Over.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not going to try to pass this bill during the morning hours. I realize it is of too much importance to be given in that short time the consideration which it requires, and that there is a serious contest over it. The bill has been twice reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, in this Congress and the preceding Congress, but we have been unable to secure consideration for it in the Senate because of the situation there existing. I intend early in the next session to call the bill up for consideration. It is one that ought to be considered and acted upon by the Senate. I would like to give notice to that effect now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection the bill goes over.

The bill (S. 2842) to authorize construction of the Casper-Alcova division, North Platte project, Nebraska-Wyoming, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KENDRICK. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 4080) to regulate the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes was announced as next in order.

Mr. FESS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3223) relative to the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. FESS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 60) to hear and determine the contest of George M. Pritchard against Josiah W. Bailey for a seat in the Senate from the State of North Carolina was announced as next in order.

Mr. COUZENS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 26) changing the name of the Committee on Pensions to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and defining its jurisdiction, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2687) to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

INVESTIGATION OF CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES, 1932

The resolution (S. Res. 174) for an investigation of campaign expenditures of presidential, vice presidential, and senatorial candidates in 1932 was announced as next in order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think we have an understanding about this resolution.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may we have the attention of the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Indiana give his attention?

Mr. WATSON. With pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. It is agreeable to the Senator from Indiana. There was a motion to reconsider made by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], who is not here, but I think we ought to take it up anyway. I will say to the Senate that I do not hesitate at all to bring it up in his absence because the Senator made this motion at my request; so that he will not object, I know, to having it taken up. It is a motion to reconsider the vote by which "$50,000" was stricken out and "$25,000" inserted.

I realize that that motion prevailed on a roll-call vote in the Senate; but, in my judgment, it was a very serious mistake, for the committee can not with $25,000 do in an effective manner the work which it will be called upon to do. The fact that the committee will only have $25,000 at its disposal will injure its activities very materially. Nevertheless, Mr. President, if the Senate wants to adhere to its prior action and vote down the motion to reconsider, I think there is no objection to the adoption of the resolution. I think the Senator from Indiana is not opposed to permitting the use of $50,000 instead of $25,000, although I am not sure as to that.

Mr. WATSON. There is now no way to reach that.

Mr. NORRIS. There is by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. WATSON. I am not objecting to the adoption of the resolution, nor to having the investigating committee appointed.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that $25,000 is sufficient?

Mr. WATSON. Of course, if I were going to be on the committee and it was proposed to go into the subject thoroughly, I would want sufficient money. I do not know that even $50,000 would be sufficient. I do not know how much the Nye committee used.

Mr. NORRIS. That committee used over $100,000.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think the Senate would be willing to appropriate that much.

Mr. NORRIS. Nobody is asking for that, but the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which the Senator is a member, formed the judgment that $50,000 ought to be provided, because they submitted an amendment striking out "$100,000" which was provided in the resolution as originally submitted by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WATSON. I have talked with a number of my colleagues and associates and they oppose increasing the amount to $50,000; and inasmuch as we have had a record vote on the question, I suggest it would be better to let the amount stand as it is and let the committee be appointed.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I can not expect to reverse the action of the Senate in view of the opposition of the leader on the Republican side, but we will have to have a vote on it, though I shall not ask for a record vote on it again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the first thing to do is to reconsider the vote whereby the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the pending motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the pending motion is to reconsider the vote whereby the amount was reduced from "$50,000" to "$25,000." If the Senate shall vote to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment as amended was agreed to, then that motion will be in order. Without objection, the vote whereby the committee amendment as amended was agreed to is reconsidered. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to reconsider the vote whereby $25,000 was substituted for $50,000.

The motion to reconsider was rejected.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, as I understand, the amendment on page 2, lines 6 to 8, has already been agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has already been agreed to. Without objection, the resolution as amended is agreed to.

Pursuant to the resolution, No. 174, the Vice President appointed Mr. HOWELL, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. CAREY, Mr. BRATTON, and Mr. CONNALLY members of the special committee to investigate campaign expenditures of the various presidential, vice presidential, and senatorial candidates in 1932.

CHARLES LAMKIN

The bill (H. R. 2704) for the relief of Charles Lamkin was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles Lamkin, of Banning, Calif., the amount of $66 in full settlement for the value of equipment belonging to him which was destroyed by fire while being used in an attempt to save Government property from burning on the San Bernardino National Forest, Calif., July 14, 1929.

FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY OF TAXI DRIVERS

The bill (S. 99) to amend section 8 of the act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1913, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I inquire what change in the law this bill proposes to make?

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, the bill does not change the present law; it only adds a provision to existing law in the effort to protect the people of the District of Columbia in connection with the operation of taxicabs. At present there is no financial responsibility on the part of the taxicab driver; a good many people have been injured and have been unable to secure any redress, and this bill endeavors to protect the public. That is its object.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS AND RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 4291) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 186) favoring an expression on Mother's Day of our love and reverence for motherhood was announced as next in order.

Mr. FESS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 436) to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, in respect to the definition of intoxicating liquor was announced as next in order.

Mr. FESS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2473) to provide for increasing the permissible alcoholic content of beer, ale, or porter to 3⅕ per cent by weight, and to provide means by which all such beer, ale, or porter shall be made of products of American farms was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

RESOLUTION INDEFINITELY POSTPONED

The resolution (S. Res. 206) opposing reductions in appropriations for the Postal and Customs Services that would seriously disrupt such services was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the object of the resolution can no longer be achieved, the bill to which it relates having become a law, I ask that the resolution may be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 368) for the relief of the Joliet National Bank and H. William, John J., Edward F., and Ellen C. Sharpe was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is absent. He has heretofore objected to the consideration of this bill. I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

FRANKLIN SURETY CO.

The bill (S. 4258) authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Franklin Surety Co. was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of the Franklin Surety Co. for extra work performed in connection with the completion of contract of April 10, 1929, between the United States and the Wiglan Building Co. (Inc.) for remodeling the Government warehouse at New York, N. Y., and to allow thereon not to exceed $11,725.71 in full and final settlement of all claims by the said Franklin Surety Co. against the United States arising out of said contract. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $11,725.71, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of said claim.

COMMANDER FRANCIS JAMES CLEARY, UNITED STATES NAVY

The bill (S. 4270) for the relief of Commander Francis James Cleary, United States Navy, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter Commander Francis James Cleary, United States Navy, retired, an additional number in grade and designated for the performance of engineering duty only, who has heretofore been wounded in line of duty, shall be regarded as having been retained on active duty and as having been promoted to the rank of captain on the active list in the United States Navy as an additional number in grade to perform engineering duty only, with precedence next after the captain who immediately preceded him when in the grade of commander: Provided further, That no increased pay or allowance shall accrue prior to the date of this act.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 4567) to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

OTOE AND MISSOURIA TRIBES OF INDIANS

The bill (S. 4578) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to adjudicate the rights of the Otoe and Missouria Tribes of Indians to compensation on a basis of guardian and ward was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Court of Claims to receive, hear, determine, and adjudicate all claims and complaints of the Otoe and Missouria Tribe or Tribes of Indians of whatsoever nature, which either or both of such tribes of Indians (considered as a unit or as two tribes) or the members of such tribe or tribes (considered on the basis of their tribal entity prior to their acceptance of allotments in severalty) may have or claim to have against the United States. Pursuant to the jurisdiction conferred, such tribe or tribes may bring suit against the United States in the Court of Claims upon any and every matter relating to, or arising out of, the status or relationship of the United States as guardian, quasi guardian, curator, or quasi curator of such tribe or tribes and the members thereof and as trustee or quasi trustee of their property and funds, from the inception of such status or relationship until the date of the approval of this act. The jurisdiction conferred shall include the right to determine and adjudicate the amount or amounts, if any, due to such tribe or tribes from the United States, under any law of Congress, any treaty between the United States and such tribe or tribes, any stipulation or contract (express or implied) between the United States and such tribe or tribes, or any regulation of an executive department, or for the misappropriation, misapplication, withholding, or nonpayment of any funds of such tribe or tribes and of the Indian citizens or members of such tribe or tribes. The description of, or reference to, any particular claims or complaints in this act shall not be construed to limit in any manner the jurisdiction conferred on the Court of Claims.

SEC. 2. The jurisdiction conferred in the first section shall extend to and include all claims arising in law or in equity and shall include jurisdiction and power—

(1) to consider the inequities, injustices, and improprieties of treaties or agreements with such tribe or tribes in respect to their several reservations and their lands and their removal therefrom;

(2) to determine the rights of such tribe or tribes for compensation for lands and reservation privileges in Kansas and Nebraska set apart unto such tribe or tribes under the treaty of March 15, 1854;

(3) to determine the cost and expense of the removal of such tribe or tribes from their Nebraska reservations to other lands and to reimburse them therefor;

(4) to ascertain and adjudge the rights of such tribe or tribes in law and in equity to other lands than those included in their respective treaties and to determine whether such lands have ever been settled for or not;

(5) to consider inequities, injustices, and improprieties in the public auction by officers of the United States and others of the lands of such tribe or tribes and determine the equity, justice, and propriety of the manner and amount of payment therefor;

(6) to consider and determine the inequity, impropriety, and any unfair or dishonest dealing with such tribe or tribes in the securing of the contracts on November 20, 1899, and to determine their rights and equities de novo, notwithstanding the confirmation thereof by act of Congress approved April 4, 1900 (31 Stat. 59), nor by any receipts given in full or otherwise by the Indians under such settlement, nor shall such receipts be evidence of any fact except that of payment and the amount thereof;

(7) to determine and adjudge the sum or sums found to be due such Indians either in law or in equity on the basis of fair dealing between guardian and ward or trustee and cestui que trust and taking fully into consideration the fact that such Indians were a dependent people inexperienced in law and in business; and

(8) to require the United States to prepare, render, and submit as such guardian and trustee a full, true, and correct itemized account of its dealings with such tribe or tribes in receipts and disbursements of moneys and its securing of treaties, contracts, or stipulations waiving, relinquishing, or receipting therefor without the actual payment thereof.

SEC. 3. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to assign some officer or employee of the United States, learned in the law with respect to Indian treaties and a thoroughly competent statistician or historian learned in the laws, history, and affairs of such tribe or tribes and the associated and confederated tribes of the Indians of the general portion of the United States inhabited by such tribe or tribes, to assist in the preparation and presentation of claims for and on behalf of such tribe or tribes and to represent them before the Court of Claims and in all appellate proceedings in all matters within the purview or contemplation of this act.

SEC. 4. (a) The burden of proof in all proceedings within the purview of this act shall follow the rules and practice in matters of guardianship accounts in the courts having jurisdiction of the settlement of minors' estates and the burden of proof shall rest upon the parties where, according to the laws, practice, and custom of the United States and of the several States, such burden of proof would rest as between guardian and ward.

(b) The claims which such tribe or tribes assert or desire to present in the Court of Claims under the authority of this act, whether legal or equitable, may be consolidated in one action and prosecuted to final determination, and the court shall do justice and equity irrespective of form and manner of pleading. Should any separate or separable matter be omitted from, or not be set forth in, any suit, brought under authority of this act, the omission of, or failure to set forth, such matter shall not prejudice the right to bring a subsequent suit therefor. Verification of all pleadings may be made by attorney for the interested parties whom he represents.

(c) The rights and privileges herein conferred upon such tribe or tribes and the individual members thereof may be exercised by the individual members, except that if such rights be asserted or exercised by individuals, it shall require at least 25 per cent of the individual members of such tribe or tribes to initiate proceedings within the purview of this act, but the benefits and results of such proceedings shall inure pro rata to the several members of such tribe or tribes as shown by the allotment schedules and the descent, inheritance, and succession rights resulting therefrom.

(d) In determining the rights of such tribe or tribes or members thereof it shall not be necessary to join either as plaintiff or defendant any other Indians or tribes of Indians, but the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized and directed in the course of any proceeding within the purview of this act to protect all rights and interests of any other tribe of Indians or the individual members thereof.

(e) No suit may be instituted under the authority of this act after seven years from the date of enactment of this act.

SEC. 5. (a) Upon the final determination of any suit instituted pursuant to the authority of this act, the Court of Claims shall allow as part of its decree or judgment such amount or amounts as it may deem reasonable (not exceeding 10 per cent of the amount of recovery against the United States) to be paid for the services, expenses, and disbursement of attorneys now or hereafter employed by such tribe or tribes of Indians or members thereof in representing them in any matter or matters appertaining to each and all of the several claims of such Indians and may direct the manner of payment thereof.

(b) The court shall also allow interest on all items wherein it would be equitable so to do at customary rate in such matters from the date of accrual of the claim or claims involved, or the court may in any particular claim or item, in its discretion, allow an equitable increase in the amount of recovery based on the long delay and lapse of time between the time of accrual of such claim and the adjudication thereof.

(c) The court shall also allow as part of its decree or judgment, in addition to any other costs allowed, costs against the United States for the taking of depositions, including the expense of stenographic and notarial services and costs of transmission.

(d) Either party aggrieved by the final decree or judgment of the Court of Claims may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

OPERATION OF MOTOR VEHICLES IN THE DISTRICT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3053) to promote safety on the streets and highways of the District of Columbia by providing for the financial responsibility of owners and operators of motor vehicles for damages caused by motor vehicles on the public highways in the District of Columbia; to prescribe penalties for the violation of the provisions of this act, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I would ask that this bill go over; but after conferring with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] I understand he is willing to accept this proposition: That on page 8 the first amendment should be rejected and also the second amendment striking out a part of the original Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that the Senate proceed with the committee amendments and deal under the agreement with the amendments referred to when they are reached in order.

Mr. BLAINE. I was going to ask if I was stating the understanding correctly.

Mr. KEAN. I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The first amendment was, in section 2, page 1, line 6, after the word "operator's," to strike out "or chauffeur's" and to insert "permit"; on page 2, line 6, after the words "of the," to insert "act of Congress approved March 3, 1925, as amended, and commonly known as the"; in line 8, after the word "Acts," to strike out "of the District of Columbia"; after line 11, to strike out "such other violations as constitute cause for suspension or revocation of licenses in the District of Columbia; or"; in line 18, after the words "by the," to strike out "director of traffic (hereinafter called the director) because of such conviction" and insert "Commissioners of the District of Columbia or their designated agent"; on page 3, line 9, after the word "operator's," to strike out "license" and insert "permit"; in line 20, after the words "of the," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent"; in line 21, after the words "and the," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent"; on page 4, line 11, after the words "and the," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent"; in line 16, after the word "court," to strike out "or of the court where it has no clerk"; in line 18, after the words "to the," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent"; in line 19, after "transcript," to strike out "thereof. A certified copy or transcript of the judgment, order, or record of other action of the court" and insert "thereof, which said certified copy or transcript"; and in line 22, after the word "of," to strike out "such convictions" and insert "the facts," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. The motor-vehicle operator's permit and all of the registration certificates of any person who shall by a final order or judgment have been convicted of or shall have forfeited any bond or collateral given for a violation of any of the following provisions of law, to wit—

Driving while under the influence of intoxicating liquor or narcotic drugs, as provided in section 10 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1925, as amended, and commonly known as the traffic acts;

Leaving the scene of an automobile accident in which personal injury occurs without making identity known, as provided in section 10 of said traffic acts;

A conviction of an offense in any other State, which if committed in the District of Columbia would be a violation of any of the aforesaid provisions of the traffic acts of the District of Columbia; shall be suspended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or their designated agent and shall remain so suspended and shall not at any time thereafter be renewed, nor shall any other motor vehicle be thereafter registered in his name until he shall give proof of his ability to respond thereafter in damages resulting from the ownership or operation of a motor vehicle and arising by reason of personal injury to or death of any one person of at least $5,000, and, subject to the aforesaid limit for each person injured or killed, of at least $10,000 for such injury to or the death of two or more persons in any one accident, and for damage to property of at least $1,000 resulting from any one accident. Such proof in said amounts shall be furnished for each motor vehicle owned or registered by such person. If any such person shall fail to furnish said proof, his operator's permit and registration certificates shall remain suspended and shall not at any time thereafter be renewed, nor shall any other motor vehicle be thereafter registered in his name until such time as said proof be given. If such person shall not be a resident of the District of Columbia the privilege of operating any motor vehicle in the District of Columbia and the privilege of operation within the District of Columbia of any motor vehicle owned by him shall be withdrawn until he shall have furnished such proof: Provided, That in case of both residents, and nonresidents, however, it it shall be duly established to the satisfaction of the said commissioners or their designated agent, and the said commissioners or their designated agent shall so find (a) that any such person so convicted, or who shall have plead guilty or forfeited bond or collateral, was, upon the occasion of the violation upon which such conviction, plea, or forfeiture was based, a chauffeur or motor-vehicle operator, however designated, in the employ of the owner of such motor vehicle; or a member of the same family and household of the owner of such motor vehicle, and (b) that there was not, at the time of such violation, or subsequent thereto, up to the date of such finding, any motor vehicle registered in the District of Columbia in the name of such person convicted, entering a plea of guilty or forfeiting bond or collateral, as aforesaid, then in such event, if the person in whose name such motor vehicle is registered shall give proof of ability to respond in damages, in accordance with the provisions of this act (and the said commissioners or their designated agent shall accept such proof from such person), such chauffeur or other person, as aforesaid, shall thereupon be relieved of the necessity of giving such proof in his own behalf. It shall be the duty of the clerk of the court in which any such judgment or order is rendered or other action taken to forward immediately to the said commissioners or their designated agent a certified copy or transcript thereof, which said certified copy or transcript shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, section 3, line 24, after the word "operator's," to strike out "license" and insert "permit"; on page 5, line 4, after the word "by," to strike out "expiration without appeal" and insert "expiration, without appeal"; in line 13, after the words "by the," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent"; in line 16, after the word "same," to insert "is or"; in line 24, after the word "to," to strike out "director" and insert "the said commissioners or their designated agent"; on page 6, line 2, after the words "of the," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent"; in line 10, after the word "such," to strike out "license" and insert "permit"; in line 15, after the word "personal," to strike out "inury" and insert "injury"; on page 7, line 3, after the word "only," to insert "And provided further, That a judgment debtor to whom this section applies may, for the sole purpose of giving authority to the commissioners or their designated agent to authorize the judgment debtor to operate a motor vehicle thereafter, on due notice to the judgment creditor, apply to the court in which the trial judgment was obtained for the privilege of paying such judgment in installments, and the court, in its discretion and without prejudice to any other legal remedies which the judgment creditor may have, may so order, fixing the amounts and times of payment of the installments. While the judgment debtor is not in default in payment of such installments, the commissioners or their designated agent upon his giving proof of ability to respond in damages for future accidents, as herein provided, may, in their discretion, restore or refrain from suspending his operator's permit and registration certificate or certificates; but such permit and certificate or certificates shall be suspended as hereinbefore provided if and when the commissioners or their designated agent are satisfied that the judgment debtor has failed to comply with the terms of the court order"; and on page 7, line 25, after the word "the," to strike out "streets and," so as to read:

SEC. 3. The operator's permit and all of the registration certificates of any person, in the event of his failure to satisfy every judgment arising from an accident, or accidents, happening subsequently to the effective date of this act and which shall have become final by expiration, without appeal, of the time within which appeal might have been perfected or by final affirmance on appeal, rendered against him by a court of competent jurisdiction in the District of Columbia or any State, or in a district court of the United States, for damages on account of personal injury, or damages to property in excess of $100, resulting from the ownership or operation of a motor vehicle by him, his agent, or any other person with the express or implied consent of the owner, shall be forthwith suspended by the said commissioners or their designated agent upon receiving a certified copy of such final judgment or judgments from the court in which the same is or are rendered and shall remain so suspended and shall not be renewed, nor shall any other motor vehicle be thereafter registered in his name while any such judgment remains unstayed, unsatisfied, and subsisting, and until the said person gives proof of his ability to respond in damages, as required in section 4 of this act, for future accidents. It shall be the duty of the clerk of the court in which any such judgment is rendered to forward immediately to the said commissioners or their designated agent a certified copy of such judgment or a transcript thereof. In the event the defendant is a nonresident, it shall be the duty of the said commissioners or their designated agent to transmit to the commissioner of motor vehicles (or officer in charge of the issuance of operators' permits and registration certificates) of the State of which the defendant is a resident a certified copy of the said judgment. If after such proof has been given any other such judgment shall be recovered against such person for any accident occurring before such proof was furnished, and after the effective date of this act, such permit and certificates shall again be and remain suspended while any such judgment remains unsatisfied and subsisting: Provided, however, That (1) when $5,000 has been credited upon any judgment or judgments rendered in excess of that amount for personal injury to or the death of one person as the result of any one accident; (2) when, subject to the limit of $5,000 for each person, the sum of $10,000 has been credited upon any judgments rendered in excess of that amount for personal injury to or the death of more than one person as the result of any one accident; or (3) when $1,000 has been credited upon any judgment or judgments rendered in excess of that amount for damage to property as the result of any one accident resulting from the ownership or operation of a motor vehicle by such judgment debtor, his agent, or any other person, with his express or implied consent, then and in such event such payment or payments shall be deemed a satisfaction of such judgment or judgments for the purposes of this section only: And provided further, That a judgment debtor to whom this section applies may, for the sole purpose of giving authority to the commissioners or their designated agent to authorize the judgment debtor to operate a motor vehicle thereafter, on due notice to the judgment creditor, apply to the court in which the trial judgment was obtained for the privilege of paying such judgment in installments, and the court, in its discretion and without prejudice to any other legal remedies which the judgment creditor may have, may so order, fixing the amounts and times of payment of the installments. While the judgment debtor is not in default in payment of such installments, the commissioners or their designated agent, upon his giving proof of abiliy to respond in damages for future accidents, as herein provided, may, in their discretion, restore or refrain from suspending his operator's permit and registration certificate or certificates; but such permit and certificate or certificates shall be suspended as hereinbefore provided if and when the commissioners or their designated agent are satisfied that the judgment debtor has failed to comply with the terms of the court order.

Whenever any motor vehicle, after the passage of this act, shall be operated upon the public highways of the District of Columbia by any person other than the owner, with the consent of the owner, express or implied, the operator thereof shall, in case of accident, be deemed to be the agent of the owner of such motor vehicle.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 4, after the word "vehicle," to insert "and the proof of the ownership of said motor vehicle shall be prima facie evidence that such person operated said motor vehicle with the consent of the owner."

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 19, to strike out:

In all cases of persons who have been tried and convicted or plead guilty of violations of traffic laws of the District of Columbia the operation by a nonresident or with his express or implied consent, if an owner of a motor vehicle, on any public street or highway of the District of Columbia, shall be deemed equivalent to an appointment by such nonresident of the director or his successor in office to be his true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served all lawful processes in any action or proceedings against him growing out of any accident or collision in which said nonresident may be involved while so operating or so permitting to be operated a motor vehicle on any such street or highway, and said operation shall be a signification of his agreement that any such process against him, which is so served, shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served upon him personally. Service of such process shall be made by leaving a copy of the process with a fee of $2 in the hands of the director, or in his office, and such service shall be sufficient service upon the said nonresident: Provided, That notice of such service and a copy of the process are forthwith sent by registered mail by the plaintiff, or his attorney, to the defendant, and the defendant's return receipt appended to the writ and entered with the declaration. The court in which the action is pending may order such continuances as may be necessary to afford the defendant a reasonable opportunity to defend the action.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The operation by a nonresident or by his agent of a motor vehicle on any public highway of the District of Columbia shall be deemed equivalent to an appointment by such nonresident of the director of vehicles and traffic or his successor in office to be his true and lawful attorney, upon whom may be served all lawful processes in any action or proceedings against such nonresident growing out of any accident or collision in which said nonresident or his agent may be involved while operating a motor vehicle on any such public highway, and said operation shall be a signification of his agreement that any such process against him, which is so served, shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served upon him personally in the District of Columbia. Service of such process shall be made by leaving a copy of the process with a fee of $2 in the hands of the director of vehicles and traffic or in his office, and such service shall be sufficient service upon the said nonresident: Provided, That the plaintiff in such action shall first file in the court in which said action is commenced an undertaking in form and amount, and with one or more sureties, approved by said court, to reimburse the defendant, on the failure of the plaintiff to prevail in the action, for the expenses necessarily incurred by the defendant, including a reasonable attorney's fee in an amount to be fixed by the said court, in defending the action in the District of Columbia: And provided further, That notice of such service and a copy of the process are forthwith sent by registered mail by the plaintiff or his attorney to the defendant, and the defendant's return receipt appended to the writ and entered with the declaration, or such notice of such service and a copy of the process may be served upon the defendant in the manner provided by section 105 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia. The court in which the action is pending may order such continuances as may be necessary to afford the defendant a reasonable opportunity to defend the action, and no judgment by default in any such action shall be granted until at least 20 days shall have elapsed after service upon the defendant, as hereinabove provided, of a copy of the process and notice of service of said process upon the director of vehicles and traffic.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment to the text of the original Senate bill may be disagreed to.

Mr. KEAN. I accept that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 11, line 23, after the word "The," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent," and on page 12, line 8, after the word "The," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent," so as to read:

SEC. 4. Proof of ability to respond in damages when required by this act may be evidenced by the written certificate or certificates of any insurance carrier, duly authorized to do business within the District of Columbia, or in the case of a nonresident by an insurance carrier authorized to transact business in any of the several States, that it has issued to or for the benefit of the person named therein a motor-vehicle liability policy or policies as defined in this act which, at the date of said certificate or certificates, is in full force and effect and designating therein by explicit description or by other appropriate reference all motor vehicles with respect to which coverage is granted by the policy certified to. The said commissioners or their designated agent shall not accept any certificate or certificates unless the same shall cover all motor vehicles registered in the name of the person furnishing such proof. Additional certificates as aforesaid shall be required as a condition precedent to the registration of any additional motor vehicle or motor vehicles in the name of such person required to furnish proof as aforesaid. Said certificate or certificates shall certify that the motor-vehicle liability policy or policies therein cited shall not be canceled except upon 10 days' prior written notice thereof to the said commissioners or their designated agent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 14, after the word "record," to insert "and filed with the said commissioners or their designated agent," and in line 18, after the word "The," to strike out "director. Such bond shall constitute a lien in favor of the District of Columbia upon the real estate of any surety, which lien shall exist in favor of any holder of any final judgment on account of damage to property over $100 in amount or injury to any person or persons caused by the operation of suoh person's motor vehicle, upon the filing of notice to that effect by the director in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia," and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent. Such bond in the case where individual sureties are offered shall contain a schedule of the real estate of said sureties and shall constitute a lien in favor of the District of Columbia upon said real estate, which lien shall exist in favor of any holder of any final judgment thereafter rendered on account of damage to property over $100 in amount or injury to any person or persons caused by the operation of such person's motor vehicle. Said bond shall be recorded by the principal named therein among the land records of the District of Columbia before the same is filed with the commissioners or their designated agent. If a final judgment rendered after the filing of the bond as aforesaid against the principal named in the surety or real estate bond for damages sustained to person or property while said bond remains in force or effect shall not be satisfied within 30 days after its rendition, the judgment creditor may, for his own use and benefit and at his sole expense, bring an action in the name of the District of Columbia against the company or persons executing such bond," so as to make the clause read:

Such proof may be the bond of a surety company duly authorized to do business within the District of Columbia or a bond with at least two individual sureties, each owning unencumbered real estate in the District of Columbia, approved by a judge of a court of record, and filed with the said commissioners or their designated agent, which said bond shall be conditioned for the payment of the amounts specified in section 2 hereof and shall not be cancelable except after 10 days' written notice to the said commissioners or their designated agent. Such bond in the case where individual sureties are offered shall contain a schedule of the real estate of said sureties and shall constitute a lien in favor of the District of Columbia upon said real estate, which lien shall exist in favor of any holder of any final judgment thereafter rendered on account of damage to property over $100 in amount or injury to any person or persons caused by the operation of such person's motor vehicle. Said bond shall be recorded by the principal named therein among the land records of the District of Columbia before the same is filed with the commissioners or their designated agent. If a final judgment rendered after the filing of the bond as aforesaid against the principal named in the surety or real estate bond for damages sustained to person or property while said bond remains in force or effect shall not be satisfied within 30 days after its rendition, the judgment creditor may, for his own use and benefit and at his sole expense, bring an action in the name of the District of Columbia against the company or persons executing such bond.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 22, after the word "The," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent"; in line 25, after the word "money," to strike out "or collateral"; on page 14, line 1, before the word "shall," to strike out "or collateral"; in the same line, after "$11,000," insert "The said clerk shall accept such deposit and issue a receipt therefor"; in line 3, after the word "money," to strike out "or collateral"; in line 6, after the word "full," to strike out "The said clerk shall accept any such deposit and issue a receipt therefor"; in line 8, after the word "therefor," to insert "Such money shall be held by the said clerk to satisfy, in accordance with the provisions of this act, any execution issued against such person in any suit arising out of damage caused by the operation of any motor vehicle owned or operated by such person. Money so deposited shall not be subject to attachment or execution unless such attachment or execution shall arise out of a suit for damages, including injury to property, and personal injury or death, as a result of the operation of a motor vehicle," so as to read:

Such proof of ability to respond in damages may also be evidence presented to the said commissioners or their designated agent of a deposit by such person with the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia of a sum of money, the amount of which money shall be $11,000. The said clerk shall accept such deposit and issue a receipt therefor. But the said clerk shall not accept a deposit of money where any judgment or judgments, theretofore recovered against such person as a result of damages arising from the operation of any motor vehicle, shall not have been paid in full. Such money shall be held by the said clerk to satisfy, in accordance with the provisions of this act, any execution issued against such person in any suit arising out of damage caused by the operation of any motor vehicle owned or operated by such person. Money so deposited shall not be subject to attachment or execution unless such attachment or execution shall arise out of a suit for damages, including injury to property, and personal injury or death, as a result of the operation of a motor vehicle.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, at the beginning of line 17, to insert "Sec. 5"; in the same line, after the word "The," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent"; in line 20, after the word "act," to insert "or of any surety or real-estate bond"; in line 24, after the word "effect," to strike out "additional evidence of ability to respond in damages shall be furnished the director at any time upon his demand"; and to insert "Upon receipt of such notice of cancellation or expiration the said commissioners or their designated agent shall require other evidence of ability to respond in damages, and upon failure to furnish the same before the effective date of such cancellation or expiration, the operator's permit and all of the registration certificates of the person failing to comply herewith shall be suspended by the commissioners or their designated agent and shall remain so suspended until such other evidence of ability to respond in damages shall have been given," so as to read:

SEC. 5. The said commissioners or their designated agent shall be notified of the cancellation or expiration of any motor-vehicle liability policy of insurance certified under the provisions of this act or of any surety or real-estate bond at least 10 days before the effective date of such cancellation or expiration. In the absence of such notice of cancellation or expiration said policy of insurance shall remain in full force and effect. Upon receipt of such notice of cancellation or expiration the said commissioners or their designated agent shall require other evidence of ability to respond in damages, and upon failure to furnish the same before the effective date of such cancellation or expiration, the operator's permit and all of the registration certificates of the person failing to comply herewith shall be suspended by the commissioners or their designated agent and shall remain so suspended until such other evidence of ability to respond in damages shall have been given.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 12, to strike out section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. Such bond, money, or collateral shall be held by the said clerk to satisfy, in accordance with the provisions of this act, any execution issued against such person in any suit arising out of damage caused by the operation of any motor vehicle owned or operated by such person. Money or collateral so deposited shall not be subject to attachment or execution unless such attachment or execution shall arise out of a suit for damages, including injury to property, and personal injury or death as a result of the operation of a motor vehicle. If a final judgment rendered against the principal on the surety or real-estate bond shall not be satisfied within 30 days after its rendition, the judgment creditor may, for his own use and benefit and at his sole expense, bring an action in the name of the District of Columbia against the company or persons executing such bond.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, section 6, after the word "The," in line 4, to strike out "director" and insert "director of vehicles and traffic"; in line 11, after the word "statute," to insert "or regulation"; in line 13, after the word "the," to insert "said"; and in line 14, after the word "The," to insert "said," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. The director of vehicles and traffic shall, upon request, furnish any insurer, person, or surety a certified abstract of the operating record of any person subject to the provisions of this act, which abstract shall fully designate the motor vehicles, if any, registered in the name of such person, and if there shall be no record of any conviction of such person of a violation of any provision of any statute or regulation relating to the operation of a motor vehicle or of any injury or damage caused by such person as herein provided the said director shall so certify. The said director shall collect for each such certificate the sum of $1.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, section 7, after the word "The," to strike out "director" and insert "director of vehicles and traffic," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. The director of vehicles and traffic shall furnish any person who may have been injured in person or property by any motor vehicle, upon written request, with all information of record in his office pertaining to the evidence of the ability of any operator or owner of any motor vehicle to respond in damages.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 21, to strike out section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. Any operator or any owner whose operator's license or certificate of registration shall have been suspended as herein provided, or whose policy of insurance or surety bond shall have been canceled or terminated, or who shall neglect to furnish additional evidence of ability to respond in damages upon request of the director shall immediately return to the director his operator's license, certificate of registration, and the number plates issued thereunder. If any person shall fail to return to the director the operator's license, certificate of registration, and the number plates issued thereunder as provided herein, the director shall forthwith direct any member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia to secure possession thereof and to return the same to the office of the director. Any person failing to return on demand such operator's license or such certificate and number plates shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not more than $100, and such penalty shall be in addition to any penalty imposed for any violation of the provisions of the traffic acts as given in section 2 of this act. The amount of such fine shall be paid in the manner provided for the payment of fines for violations of the traffic acts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 18, to strike out section 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. The director may cancel such bond or return such evidence of insurance, or the said clerk may, with the consent of the director, return such money or collateral to the person furnishing the same, provided three years shall have elapsed since the filing of such evidence or the making of such deposit, during which period such person shall not have violated any provision of the traffic acts referred to in section 2, and provided no suit or judgment for damages on account of personal injury or damage to property in excess of $100 resulting from the operation of motor vehicle by him or his agent, shall then be outstanding against such person. The director may direct the return of any money or collateral to the person who furnished the same upon the acceptance and substitution of other evidence of his ability to respond in damages or, at any time after three years from the expiration of any registration or license issued to such person, provided no written notice shall have been filed with the director stating that such suit has been brought against such person by reason of the ownership, maintenance, or operation of a motor vehicle and upon the filing by such person with the director of an affidavit that he has abandoned his residence in the District of Columbia or that he has made a bona fide sale of any and all motor vehicles owned by him and does not intend to own or operate any motor vehicle in the District of Columbia for a period of one or more years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 19, to insert:

SEC. 8. Any operator or any owner whose operator's permit or certificate of registration shall have been suspended as herein provided shall immediately return to the director of vehicles and traffic his operator's permit, certificate of registration, and the number plates issued thereunder. If any person shall fail to return to the said director the operator's permit, certificate of registration, and the number plates issued thereunder as provided herein, the said director shall forthwith direct any member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia to secure possession thereof and to return the same to the office of the said director. Any person failing to return on demand such operator's permit or such certificate and number plates shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not more than $100, and each day such person shall fail to return the same shall constitute a separate offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 10, to insert:

SEC. 9. The said commissioners or their designated agent may cancel such bond or return such evidence of insurance, or the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia may, with the consent of the said commissioners or their designated agent, return such money to the person furnishing the same, provided three years shall have elapsed since the filing of such evidence or the making of such deposit, during which period such person shall not have violated any provision of the traffic acts referred to in section 2, and provided no suit or judgment for damages on account of personal injury or damage to property in excess of $100 resulting from the operation of a motor vehicle by him or his agent shall then be outstanding against such person; and the affidavit of such person that he has not so violated the motor vehicle laws and that there are then outstanding against him no suits or judgments for damages as aforesaid shall be sufficient proof thereof in the absence of evidence to the contrary then before the commissioners or their designated agent. The said commissioners or their designated agent may direct the return of any money to the person who furnished the same upon the acceptance and substitution of other evidence of his ability to respond in damages or, at any time after three years from the expiration of the latest registration or permit issued to such person, provided no written notice shall have been filed with the director stating that such suit had been brought against such person by reason of the ownership, maintenance, or operation of a motor vehicle and upon the filing by such person with the said commissioners or their designated agent of an affidavit that he has abandoned his residence in the District of Columbia or that he has made bona fide sale of any and all motor vehicles owned by him and does not intend to own or operate any motor vehicle in the District of Columbia for a period of one or more years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, section 11, line 3, after the word "the," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. Any person who shall forge or, without authority, sign any evidence of ability to respond in damages as required by the said commissioners or their designated agent in the administration of this act shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 or imprisoned not to exceed one year, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, section 12, line 16, after the word "the," to strike out "director of traffic" and insert "said commissioners or their designated agent," so as to make the clause read:

(c) The insurance carrier shall, upon the request of the insured, deliver to the insured for filing, or at the request of the insured shall file direct, with the said commissioners or their designated agent an appropriate certificate as set forth in section 4 hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 21, after the word "the," to strike out "issue" and insert "issuance," so as to make the clause read:

(d) Any carrier authorized to issue motor-vehicle liability policies as provided for in this act may, pending the issuance of such a policy, execute an agreement, to be known as a binder; or may, in lieu of such a policy, issue an indorsement to an existing policy, each of which shall be construed to provide indemnity or protection in like manner and to the same extent as such a policy. The provisions of this section shall apply to such binders and indorsements.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, section 13, after line 14, to insert:

(d) "Public highway" shall include any street, road, or public thoroughfare.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, section 14, line 17, after the word "the," to strike out "director" and insert "said commissioners," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 14. The said commissioners shall make rules and regulations necessary for the administration of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, probably in all America there is no city which has a more efficient, reliable, honest, or industrious set of what we sometimes call "jehus"; that is, men who drive taxicabs. I am informed that in this bill, which I have not had an opportunity carefully to peruse or in some other bill there is a provision which raises the fees which these "jehus" or taxicab drivers must pay from $10 to $25 a year.

Mr. KEAN. That is a bill that has been passed.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

It would be monstrously unjust to increase the license fee when these taxicabs drivers are working, some of them, 12 and 13 and I know some of them work 18 hours a day to earn a bare subsistence. I hope no legislation will be enacted that will give the Commissioners of the District the authority to increase the license fee from $10 to $25; and I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if this bill in any way grants to the commissioners any authority to raise the fee from ten to twenty-five dollars per annum.

Mr. KEAN. Not this bill. That is the other bill.

Mr. CAPPER. This bill has nothing to do with the matter of licenses for the operation of taxicabs.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the able Senator advise us as to whether or not the commissioners intend to enter any order raising the license fees from ten to twenty-five dollars per annum?

Mr. CAPPER. That has already been covered by what is known as the schedule of license fees, which had the approval of both Houses some weeks ago and was signed by the President.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I was not aware that such a bill had passed. I regret it, and if it were within my power I should proceed to undo that provision of the bill.

Mr. CAPPER. No objection came to the committee. I may say that the schedule covered every activity of the District of Columbia, and among others was the license for taxicabs; and it is not out of line with the charge which all other cities make.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, is there a written report on this bill?

Mr. KEAN. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. DILL. There is none on file in the calendar I have.

Mr. CAPPER. There is a very carefully prepared and comprehensive report.

Mr. DILL. What is the purpose of this bill?

Mr. CAPPER. Its purpose is to put a check on careless and reckless motorists and to establish some responsibility.

Mr. DILL. Under this bill, are the commissioners given authority to drive these 20-cent taxicabs off the streets?

Mr. CAPPER. No; not at all.

Mr. DILL. Are they given authority here to require meters?

Mr. CAPPER. Not in this bill. That question, of course, is now pending in the courts; but they think they already have that authority.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does this bill give them additional authority?

Mr. CAPPER. It does not.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think this is too long a bill to be rushed through here under the 5-minute rule. I do not think this bill ought to pass; and I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will not the Senator withhold his objection for one moment? This bill has been on the calendar since January 16.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the Senator in charge of the bill should have brought it up in the regular way. It is too long a bill to rush through here, with a great lot of amendments, under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. KEAN. It is a very important bill and ought to be passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey whether the bill in any way fixes rates?

Mr. KEAN. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not give the commissioners any additional power to fix rates or to require meters?

Mr. KEAN. No; it does not. It is just a bill for the control of people coming into the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAPPER. Let me say to the Senator that the public is now absolutely helpless so far as protection against irresponsible and careless drivers in this city is concerned, and this bill is intended to take care of that situation. The legislation is urged by the District Commissioners, by the traffic department, and by every civic organization in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, in short, this bill is intended to require automobilists to take out bonds, liability-insurance policies. That is the purpose of the bill. It is a very long and complicated bill. I do not care to go into a discussion of its details.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Washington to maintain his objection.

Mr. DILL. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 7) to provide for the deportation of certain alien seamen, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 154) to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1197) to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness and to encourage and promote agriculture, commerce, and industry, by establishing an efficient credit system, through which the unjust and unequal burdens placed upon agriculture during the period of price fixing and deflation may be lightened, by providing for the liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness at a reduced rate of interest through the Federal farm-loan system, the Federal reserve banking system, and the postal-savings depository system, and creating a board of agriculture to supervise the same, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan will state it.

Mr. COUZENS. This bill having been referred to the Banking and Currency Committee as an amendment to the home loan bank bill, how can we dispose of it on the calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It should be taken off the calendar, or a notation made that it has been referred to the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. I move then that it be noted on the calendar as having been referred to the Banking and Currency Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That notation will be made.

The bill (S. 3243) to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, with respect to the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States over suits relating to orders of State administrative boards was announced as next in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 4565) to amend the railway labor act was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

HORACE G. KNOWLES

The bill (S. 4318) for the relief of Horace G. Knowles was announced as next in order.

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask that that bill be recommitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 4726) to supplement the migratory bird conservation act by providing funds for the acquisition of areas for use as migratory-bird sanctuaries, refuges, and breeding grounds, for developing and administering such areas, for the protection of certain migratory birds, for the enforcement of the migratory bird treaty act and regulations thereunder, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2613) for the relief of Lynn Bros.' Benevolent Hospital was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that bill has been objected to each time by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. In his absence I think I should request it to go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3188) for the relief of Dr. A. M. Newton, of Pocatello, Idaho, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. I make the same request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 10238) creating a reimbursable fund to be used for special medical and surgical work among the Indians of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 11499) for restoring and maintaining the purchasing power of the dollar was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3346) to provide for the escheat to the United States of certain deposits in national banks was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2370) for the conservation of lobsters, to regulate interstate transportation of lobsters, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] if that bill is satisfactory to him?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, we can not hear what is being said.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], and also the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] were interested in this bill; and I was inquiring from the Senator from Maine if it is satisfactory to them now.

Mr. WHITE. It is eminently satisfactory to the Senator from Maine. I can not speak for the others.

Mr. JOHNSON. I spoke merely because I observed both of the other Senators to be absent. Oh, I see the Senator from Massachusetts here. Pardon me.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1301) to renew and extend certain letters patent was announced as next in order.

Mr. COUZENS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. COPELAND subsequently said: Mr. President, what happened to Calendar No. 812, Senate bill 1301?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was passed over on objection.

Mr. COPELAND. I simply desire to say for the benefit of the RECORD that the purpose of the bill is to relieve the financial embarrassment of persons who put money into a patent where, by reason of dishonest practices, the patent has expired. There is ample authority in law for the extension of letters patent. At the proper time I hope to press the matter and get favorable consideration.

The bill (H. R. 278) to compensate the Post Office Department for the extra work caused by the payment of money orders at offices other than those on which the orders are drawn was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 4755) to provide for grants and loans to the several States to aid in relieving unemployment, to facilitate the construction of self-liquidating projects, to provide for the construction of certain authorized Federal public-works projects, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 11336) providing for an additional justice of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. COUZENS and Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I did not hear who raised the objection to this bill.

Mr. COUZENS. I objected because another Senator raised some objection the last time it came up, and I do not see him here at the present time.

Mr. HEBERT. I understand that all objections to the measure have been removed, and, so far as I know, there is no Senator who objects to it.

Mr. BRATTON. I objected to the bill also, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 12044) to provide for the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

PACKING OF OLEOMARGARINE AND ADULTERATED BUTTER

The bill (S. 4065) authorizing the packing of oleomargine and adulterated butter in tin and other suitable packages was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CONNALLY subsequently said: Mr. President, a moment ago I objected to a bill of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT]. I desire to withdraw that objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] also objected.

Mr. HEBERT. No; this is another bill. This is Senate bill 4065. I ask to recur to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate from Texas withdraws his objection, and the Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent to recur to the consideration of Senate bill 4065, Order of Business 885. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments, on page 2, line 2, after the word "such" to strike out "materials, of" and insert "materials of," and on page 3, after line 9, to strike out:

(b) The ninth paragraph of such section 4 is amended by striking out "wooden or paper packages" and "wooden or paper packages as above described" and in each case inserting in lieu thereof "packages as above described."

And to insert:

(b) The ninth paragraph of such section 4 is amended by adding after the word "wooden" wherever it appears in such paragraph a comma and the word "tin."

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of the act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886, as amended (U. S. C., title 26, secs. 543, 544), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That all oleomargarine shall be packed by the manufacturer thereof in firkins, tubs, or other wooden, tin, or paper packages, not before used for that purpose, containing, or encased in a manufacturer's package made from any of such materials of, not less than 10 pounds and marked, stamped, and branded as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and all sales made by manufacturers of oleomargarine and wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall be in original stamped packages. Retail dealers in oleomargarine must sell only from original stamped packages, in quantities not exceeding 10 pounds, and shall pack, or cause to be packed, the oleomargarine sold by them in suitable wooden, tin, or paper packages which shall be marked and branded as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe. Every person who knowingly sells or offers for sale, or delivers or offers to deliver, any oleomargarine in any other form than in new wooden, tin, or paper packages as above described, or who packs in any package any oleomargarine in any manner contrary to law, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law shall be fined for each offense not more than $1,000, and be imprisoned not more than two years."

SEC. 2. (a) The eighth paragraph of section 4 of the act of May 9, 1902 (32 Stat. 193, ch. 784), is amended to read as follows:

"That all adulterated butter shall be packed by the manufacturer thereof in firkins, tubs, or other wooden, tin, or paper packages not before used for that purpose, containing, or encased in a manufacturer's package made from any of such materials of, not less than 10 pounds, and marked, stamped, and branded as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and all sales made by manufacturers of adulterated butter shall be in original, stamped packages."

(b) The ninth paragraph of such section 4 is amended by adding after the word "wooden" wherever it appears in such paragraph a comma and the word "tin."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I have another amendment to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 10, and also on page 2, line 11; page 2, line 17; page 3, line 2; and page 3, line 16; strike out the word "tin" and in lieu thereof insert the word "tin-plate."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OBLIGATIONS TO CERTAIN ENROLLED INDIANS

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 167) to carry out certain obligations to certain enrolled Indians under tribal agreement was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That any person duly enrolled as a member of an Indian tribe who received in pursuance of a tribal treaty or agreement with the United States an allotment of land which by the terms of said treaty or agreement was exempted partially or in total from taxation, and from which land the restrictions have been or have not been removed and who was required or permitted contrary to law to pay any illegal or unauthorized Federal inheritance tax or Federal income tax on the rents, royalties, or other gains arising from such allotted lands, and who under the law and rulings of the Treasury Department have secured a refund of the taxes so illegally or erroneously collected, but who did not receive interest on such refunds in accordance with the laws and the regulations in force at the time the refund was secured and who have failed to file a claim for the allowance of such interest, shall be allowed one year after the approval of this act within which to file such claim, and if otherwise entitled thereto may recover such interest on such illegally collected taxes in the same manner and to the same extent as if such claims for interest had been theretofore duly filed as required by law, it not being the policy of the Government to invoke or plead a statute of limitations to escape the obligations of agreements solemnly entered into with its Indian wards: Provided, however, That in the case of the death of any person any such interest on the refund of illegal taxes paid by him or on his account may in like manner be claimed and recovered by the person or persons who would have received such money had it constituted a part of his estate at the time of his death.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are modified for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of carrying into effect the provisions hereof.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 4082) to regulate the business of executing bonds for compensation in criminal cases and to improve the administration of justice in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think there should be a brief explanation of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is both the author of the bill and the Senator reporting it, is not present.

Mr. MCNARY. Under those circumstances, I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

PUNISHMENT OF KIDNAPING IN THE DISTRICT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4694) to amend section 812 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Missouri if this is the bill that was under discussion a few days ago?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; it is the same bill that was under discussion.

Mr. BLAINE. I also desire to inquire of the Senator if he will accept the amendments proposed at that time?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; I am willing to accept the amendments suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

Mr. BLAINE. There were two amendments:

On page 2, line 2, strike out the words "or for any other unlawful purpose."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. The other proposed amendment was, beginning in line 5, after the semicolon, to strike out the words "except that in any such case the jury may add to their verdict, if it be guilty, the words 'with the death penalty,' in which case the punishment shall be death by electrocution."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 812 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D. C. Code, title 6, sec. 36), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 812. Whoever shall be guilty of, or of aiding or abetting in, seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnaping, abducting, concealing, or carrying away any individual, by any means whatsoever, and holding or detaining, or with the intent to hold or detain, such individual for ransom or reward, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for life or for such term as the court in its discretion may determine. This section shall be held to have been violated if either the seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnaping, abducting, concealing, carrying away, holding, or detaining occurs in the District of Columbia. If two or more individuals enter into any agreement or conspiracy to do any act or acts which would constitute a violation of the provisions of this section, and one or more of such individuals do any act to effect the object of such agreement or conspiracy, each such individual shall be deemed to have violated the provisions of this section."

BILL PASSED OVER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2349) for the relief of the First Camden National Bank & Trust Co., of Camden, N. J., which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions and limitations of section 606 of the revenue act of 1928, as amended, relating to closing agreements, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the First Camden National Bank & Trust Co., of Camden, N. J., the sum of $11,120.97 in full satisfaction of its claim for refund of taxes erroneously paid for the year 1927 on income derived from tax-exempt securities.

WIDOW OF GEORGE M. PEED

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2927) for the relief of George M. Peed.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, since this bill was passed by the House, the claimant has died, and I desire to offer an amendment to substitute the name of his widow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 4, after the word "of," insert the words "Eva May Peed, widow of," and on page 1, line 5, afer the word "Peed," insert the word "deceased," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem in favor of Eva May Peed, widow of George M. Peed, deceased, 4⅞ per cent United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness, numbered 17951 to 17954, inclusive, in the denomination of $500 each, dated September 16, 1929, matured June 16, 1930, series TJ–1930, without interest and without presentation of the said certificates which are alleged to have been lost or stolen: Provided, That the said certificates of indebtedness shall not have been previously presented and paid, and that no payment shall be made hereunder for any coupons which may have been attached to the certificates: Provided further, That said George M. Peed shall first file in the Treasury Department, a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said certificates of indebtedness in such form and with such corporate surety as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the certificates of indebtedness hereinbefore described.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act for the relief of Eva May Peed, widow of George M. Peed."

STANFIELD PROJECT, OREGON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 744) for the rehabilitation of the Stanfield project, Oregon, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with amendments, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "383" and insert "388," and on page 3, line 22, after the word "States," insert the words "within a period of 40 years," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated from the reclamation fund established by the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. L. 388), the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the rehabilitation of the Stanfield project, Oregon.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior, hereinafter styled the Secretary, is authorized to use money thus appropriated for the following purposes: (a) For the purchase of the canal system of said project, the owners thereof to convey title to the United States free of all liens and incumbrances; (b) for doing, or causing to be done under his supervision, any construction, betterment, or repair work necessary to place the irrigation system of said project in good operating condition, and as provided for in the contract hereinafter required; (c) for such drainage work as the Secretary may determine to be necessary; (d) for a loan to the Stanfield irrigation district of such sums of money as in the opinion of the Secretary are necessary for liquidating bonded and other outstanding indebtedness of such district on such basis of valuation as the Secretary may regard as equitable.

SEC. 3. All funds so used or advanced shall be repaid to the United States within a period, to be fixed by the Secretary, of not more than 40 years. Before any funds are so used or advanced a contract satisfactory to the Secretary shall be executed by an irrigation district, formed under the State law, obligating such district to repay the funds so used or advanced, as required by this act. Any contract so executed with such district shall require a lien on the land and on the irrigation system of such project. The operation and maintenance of such project shall be continued by the authorities in charge under the supervision of the Secretary, so far as necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act.

SEC. 4. In case of default in the payment of any installment due under contract executed as herein provided there shall be added to the amount unpaid a penalty of one-half of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid on the first day of each month thereafter, so long as such default shall continue. The provisions of any contract executed hereunder may be enforced by suit or by the foreclosure of any lien in the manner authorized by the State laws applicable in similar cases. In addition to other remedies, the Secretary, in any contract executed hereunder, may provide that in case of default for more than 12 months in the payment of any installment the control, operation, and maintenance of the project may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be assumed by the United States and the delivery of water withheld until payments are duly made in accordance with the contract requirements.

SEC. 5. No funds shall be appropriated for the purposes herein authorized until investigation and examination shall have been made of all pertinent conditions surrounding such project, and until the Secretary shall have made a written report of his finding to Congress that, in his opinion, by the action proposed the project can and will be placed upon a sound basis from a financial and economic standpoint so that the funds used and advanced hereunder will be returned to the United States within a period of 40 years.

SEC. 6. The Secretary is authorized to perform any and all acts and to make and enforce all needful rules and regulations for effectuating the purposes of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Claude E. Dove, of El Paso, Tex., the sum of $4,000, and to his two minor children the sum of $1,000 (said sum to be paid to said Charles E. Dove, as guardian), in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for damages sustained on account of the death of his wife, the injury of himself and two children, caused by collision with an Army truck operated by Sergeant Merlin Brace, of the United States Army, on May 24, 1929, at El Paso, Tex.: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

GUST J. SCHWEITZER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4910) for the relief of Gust J. Schweitzer, which had been reported by the Committee on Claims, with amendments, on page 1, line 10, after the numerals "$50," to strike out down to the word "each," in line 1, page 7, so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100 to Gust J. Schweitzer, as compensation in full for the loss of Liberty loan bonds destroyed in a cyclone in the vicinity of Okarche, Okla., March 15, 1919, said bonds having been numbered 2849229 and 2849230 (third 4¼ issue) in the amount of $50 each: Provided, That the said bonds shall not have been previously presented for payment and that no payment shall be made hereunder for the coupons if they shall have been previously presented and paid: Provided further, That the said Gust J. Schweitzer shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal and interest of said bonds, and the interest payable thereon, in such form and with such surety or sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the lost, stolen, or destroyed bonds or coupons herein described.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED subsequently said: Mr. President, we are going at such speed that it is hard to read the bills as they are reached. I wish the Senator from Nebraska would explain Order of Business 1064, House bill 4910. Apparently no appropriation is made for the payment of coupons on these lost bonds. The appropriation is only for the amount of the principal, but there is a proviso that payment shall be made for the coupons that were previously presented. It seems to me the language of the bill is rather confused.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, this is a House bill. As it came to the Senate, it was for $400. Three hundred dollars of these securities do not mature until 1938, and, as a consequence, the bill was amended so as not to make provision for payment of those securities. The only securities to be paid for are two securities of $50 each, which became due in 1929.

Mr. REED. How about the interest on these bonds?

Mr. HOWELL. No interest is allowed.

Mr. REED. On page 2 it says, "No payment shall be made hereunder for the coupons if they shall have been previously presented and paid." There were nine years of coupons attached to those bonds when the cyclone hit them, and the man is certainly entitled to his interest.

Mr. HOWELL. As I said, this is a House bill and——

Mr. REED. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM DALTON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1289) for the relief of William Dalton, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "compensate him for first degree" and insert in lieu thereof "in full and final settlement of all claims against the Government," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500 to the legal guardian of William Dalton, in full and final settlement of all claims against the Government, for burns received while walking on a public sidewalk, in St. Louis, Mo., on July 20, 1925, due to United States Government agents pouring alcohol into a gutter on a public highway, said alcohol being ignited as a result of some unknown person throwing a match in the gutter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

NEWPORT CONTRACTING & ENGINEERING CO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4738) for the relief of Newport Contracting & Engineering Co., which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Newport Contracting & Engineering Co., of Lee Hall, Va., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,490 in full settlement for penalty imposed for delay in completing contract Noy–673, dated October 25, 1929, with the Navy Department for submarine escape practice tank.

ELSIE M. SEARS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2189) for the relief of Elsie M. Sears, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$50" and insert in lieu thereof "$25," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Elsie M. Sears, of Plymouth, Mass., the sum of $25 in full settlement of all claims against the Government for personal injuries and damage to her clothing as the result of an accident which she suffered, without negligence on her own part on the 23d day of July, 1926, while in the Federal building in said Plymouth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DAVID C. JEFFCOAT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3467) for the relief of David C. Jeffcoat, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAUGHMAN-KAMINER CO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3460) for the relief of Caughman-Kaminer Co., which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAYMOND D. WOODS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4160) for the relief of Raymond D. Woods, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLICATION OF STATISTICS OF TOBACCO

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9590) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection and publication of statistics of tobacco by the Department of Agriculture," approved January 14, 1929, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOANS TO FARM COOPERATIVES

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 160) to amend Public Resolution No. 11, Seventy-second Congress, approved March 3, 1932, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will not object to this joint resolution. It is one that affects his State as well as the State of Virginia and my own State, in that it broadens the credit for the farmers who produce apples in those sections. It would permit the farmer, through his facility in the way of a cooperative, to get credit where it is impossible to obtain it at the present time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the bill looks like a very important measure, and one that involves a great deal of money. Will not the Senator explain it to us?

Mr. HATFIELD. It does not involve the appropriation of any additional money. It simply broadens the base of House Joint Resolution 292, in which credit is extended to the individual farmer under the $10,000,000 set aside to be distributed through the Department of Agriculture, a part of the $200,000,000 that was allocated through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to be loaned to farmers.

Mr. REED. Does it call for any additional appropriation?

Mr. HATFIELD. Not a copper.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What change would it make in the present law?

Mr. HATFIELD. It would give the cooperative the same right it gives an individual farmer, and in that way the individual farmer would be able to secure credit, which at the present time he can not get because he has no collateral to put up with the Secretary of Agriculture to negotiate a loan. Through the facility of the cooperative, credit can be extended to the individual farmer to produce apples and tomatoes, and will enable him to obtain barrels and baskets in which to pack his crop, in order that he may sell it through the cooperative, which has the title to his crops at the present time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, at present such loans can be made on these terms to individuals?

Mr. HATFIELD. To individuals.

Mr. REED. This merely allows cooperatives the same privileges that individuals now have?

Mr. HATFIELD. That is it exactly.

Mr. REED. I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 1 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the establishment of agricultural-credit corporations, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1932, is amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to make advances or loans to individuals, cooperative marketing associations, and/or agricultural-credit corporations, under such regulations as he may prescribe, for the purpose of assisting in forming local agricultural-credit corporations, livestock-loan companies, or like organizations, or of increasing the capital stock of such corporations, companies, or organizations qualified to do business with Federal intermediate credit banks, or to which such privileges may be extended. In order to carry out the provisions of this section the Secretary of Agriculture may make loans upon the stock of any such corporation, company, or organization, or may purchase stock in any such corporation, company, or organization under an agreement for the return of such stock upon the repayment of the purchase price thereof. The rate of interest on any loan made pursuant to this resolution shall not exceed the rate of interest payable on the securities in which the proceeds of such loan are invested and which are deposited with the Federal intermediate credit banks for the purpose of securing rediscount privileges, or the rate of interest on the last preceding issue of Government obligations if such rediscount privileges are not to be exercised."

SEC. 2. Paragraph (a) of section 2 of such joint resolution is amended to read as follows:

"(a) No loan shall be made upon the capital stock of, or to create or increase the capital stock of, any such corporation, company, or organization in an amount in excess of 75 per cent of the par value of the capital stock of such corporation, company, or organization upon which such loan is made."

SEC. 3. Section 3 of such joint resolution is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. No loan or advance shall be made upon the capital stock of, or to create or increase the capital of, any corporation, unless the paid-in capital stock of such corporation shall be at least $10,000."

PORTAGE ENTRY LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATION

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12251) to provide for the conveyance of the Portage Entry Lighthouse Reservation and buildings to the State of Michigan for public-park purposes, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MALCOLM ALLEN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2010) for the relief of Malcolm Allen, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE H. HOLMAN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2650) for the relief of George H. Holman, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM RAY TAPLIN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 855) for the relief of William Ray Taplin, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "and directed," and on line 4, to strike out "appropriation for the support of the Army," and insert in lieu thereof the words "appropriation 'Organized Reserves, 1933,'" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to pay, out of the appropriation "Organized Reserves, 1933," to William Ray Taplin, first lieutenant, United States Air Corps Reserve, the sum of $425.16, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for pay and allowances from November 12, 1929, to November 26, 1929, and from January 2, 1930, to February 3, 1930, the periods during which the said William Ray Taplin was receiving further medical treatment at a Government hospital in connection with injuries sustained by him in line of duty on August 16, 1929.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERSTATE TRADE IN MOTION-PICTURE FILMS

The bill (S. 3770) to prevent the obstruction of and burdens upon interstate trade and commerce in copyrighted motion-picture films, and to prevent restraint upon free competition in the production, distribution, and exhibition of copyrighted motion-picture films (a) by prohibiting the compulsory block booking of copyrighted motion-picture films; (b) by making unlawful unreasonable and discriminatory protection in favor of certain theaters over others; (c) to compel the furnishing of accurate synopses of all pictures offered to theater operators before the same have been released and reviewed; and (d) to amend section 2 of the Clayton Act to make it apply to license agreements and leases, as well as sales in interstate commerce, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION AND RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The motion to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114) proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to intoxicating liquors was announced as next in orfider.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 260) directing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to report to the Senate regarding loans made or proposed to be made by it was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED WHEAT AND COTTON

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 461) making appropriations to enable the Federal Farm Board to distribute Government-owned wheat and cotton to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress was announced as next in order.

Mr. GORE. I would like to ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations be requested to submit a report on this joint resolution, estimating what it would cost to carry it into effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the request of the Senator from Oklahoma is agreed to.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

CORINNE BLACKBURN GALE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4949) for the relief of Corinne Blackburn Gale, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Corinne Blackburn Gale, widow of William Holt Gale, late American Foreign Service officer, retired, the sum of $8,000, being one year's salary of her deceased husband: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

CANCELLATION OF PATENT TO VICTORIA ARCONGE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4024) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to cancel patent in fee issued to Victoria Arconge, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cancel the patent in fee numbered 527856 issued to Victoria Arconge under date of May 8, 1916, covering her allotment of land on the Yankton Sioux Reservation, S. Dak., described as follows: Lots 582, 583, 586, and 587 of the Yankton Indian Reservation, S. Dak., containing 160 acres, and to issue to her a trust patent in lieu thereof covering the same land to be held in trust for her sole use and benefit or in case of her decease for the sole use and benefit of her lawful heirs for the same period under the same conditions as other trust allotments are held on that reservation as extended by the last proclamation of the President relating to the said reservation and with the right of the President in his discretion to extend the trust period: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect in any way the vested interests of anyone other than the persons named herein.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO INTOXICATING LIQUORS

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, if I may, I would like very much to ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], who objected to order No. 1080, Senate Joint Resolution 114, if he will not be good enough to allow me to ask unanimous consent at this time that my motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of this joint resolution be agreed to. There is no objection to that on the part of the chairman of the committee or anybody else. It simply means that the resolution itself would go to the calendar, instead of the motion to discharge the committee. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the motion to discharge the committee be agreed to, and the resolution itself be allowed to go to the calendar.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

TREATMENT OF LEPERS IN HAWAII

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, there is on the desk of the clerk a joint resolution reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs to-day regarding an investigation by the Public Health Service of the situation with regard to the leper colony in the Hawaiian Islands. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 361) to authorize the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service to make a survey as to the existing facilities for the protection of the public health in the care and treatment of leprous persons in the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes, was read, considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service is authorized and directed to—

(1) Institute a survey by officers of the Public Health Service to determine the adequacy of facilities and extent to which provision is made for the protection of the public health in the care and treatment of leprous persons in the Territory of Hawaii, and to report upon remedial legislation providing for the further control and eradication of the disease in the Territory.

(2) Prepare an estimate of the cost of the construction and equipment of a receiving station and hospital for the care and treatment of leprous persons, including the acquisition of necessary grounds for the location of said station and hospital, and an estimate of the yearly cost of maintaining and operating such station and hospital.

In the preparation of this estimate the Surgeon General shall ascertain from the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture whether any military, naval, or other reservation suitable for the purpose is available for transfer, to be used for the location of said station and hospital, and shall consider also the cost of the purchase of the present Kalihi receiving hospital, its equipment and supplies, including the acquisition of the ground upon which the hospital is located and including such reconstruction or additional buildings as may be necessary.

The Surgeon General shall report his findings and estimates on the opening day of the second session of the Seventy-second Congress.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, there has been reported from the Committee on Commerce a bridge bill (S. 4741) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Wellsburg, W. Va. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 5, after the words "built by" to insert "the J. K. Mahone Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, by."

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Wellsburg, W. Va., authorized to be built by the J. K. Mahone Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, by an act of Congress approved May 14, 1928, heretofore extended by acts of Congress approved March 2, 1929, and May 13, 1930, are hereby further extended one year and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOME-LOAN BANKS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, what is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. WATSON. Is the Senator from Wisconsin ready for a vote?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, first I desire to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dale	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Bailey	Dickinson	Kean	Schall
Barbour	Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bingham	Fess	Keyes	Shipstead
Black	Fletcher	King	Shortridge
Blaine	Frazier	La Follette	Smoot
Borah	George	Lewis	Steiwer
Bratton	Glass	Long	Stephens
Broussard	Glenn	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Bulkley	Goldsborough	McKellar	Townsend
Bulow	Gore	McNary	Trammell
Byrnes	Hale	Metcalf	Tydings
Capper	Harrison	Moses	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hastings	Norbeck	Wagner
Cohen	Hatfield	Norris	Walcott
Connally	Hayden	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Hebert	Patterson	Watson
Copeland	Howell	Pittman	White
Couzens	Hull	Reed

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment to the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

At the proper place insert:

"That paragraph 'Eighth' of section 4 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is amended by adding before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: 'Provided, That notwithstanding any provisions of law prohibiting bonds of the United States from bearing the circulation privilege, for a period of five years from the date this paragraph as amended takes effect, all outstanding bonds of the United States heretofore issued or issued during such period and bearing a rate of interest of 3⅜ per cent or less shall be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes to Federal reserve banks, and upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States by a Federal reserve bank of any such bonds, such bank shall be entitled to receive circulating notes in the same manner and to the same extent and subject to the same conditions and limitations as now provided by law; except that the total amount of such circulating notes issued by the Comptroller of the Currency to any Federal reserve bank shall not exceed the amount of the paid-in capital stock and surplus of the national banking associations within the district of such Federal reserve bank less an amount equal to the circulating notes of all national banking associations within such district which are outstanding upon the date this paragraph as amended takes effect. Nothing contained in this paragraph as amended shall be construed to modify, amend, or repeal any law relating to bonds of the United States which bear the circulation privilege on the date this paragraph as amended takes effect.'

"As used in this act, the word 'bonds' shall not include notes, certificates, or bills issued by the United States.

"There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, in the nature of a substitute, to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Wisconsin offers the following amendment to the amendment:

That the Federal reserve act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 31. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale commodity markets for the period covering the years 1921 to 1929, inclusive, shall be restored and maintained by the control of the volume of credit and currency."

SEC. 2. The Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Secretary of the Treasury are hereby charged with the duty of making effective this policy.

SEC. 3. Acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the terms of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the text of the amendment is the text of the Goldsborough bill which passed the House and is known as H. R. 11499. I shall not debate the matter except to call attention to the fact that the Federal Reserve Board no doubt has the power to do that which the amendment in effect directs. The Federal Reserve Board exercised that power in 1920–21, but they exercised it in the reverse, that is, to depreciate prices. The proposal is to direct the Federal Reserve Board under its power to stabilize commodity prices, and the Goldsborough bill or the amendment as I have offered it is intended to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar.

I do not care to go into a further discussion of the matter. I think the whole subject has been very thoroughly debated. Everyone understands the purpose of the amendment, and therefore I rest the case with this brief statement.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The purpose and effect of the amendment would be not only to raise the level of commodity prices and increase currency circulation, but to stabilize commodity prices and stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar. Is not that correct?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes. I thank the Senator for that additional statement. I did not intend to be all inclusive in the brief remarks I made as to the purpose and effect of the amendment if it should become a law.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the question at length. I suppose everyone is familiar with what is known as the Goldsborough bill, which was overwhelmingly reported adversely by the Banking and Currency Committee and recommended in the negative unanimously by the Federal Reserve Board itself. Whatever may be the purpose of it, there could be no effect from it, and I should be very much distressed to see it passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BLAINE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in connection with the Glass-Steagall bill, at each point where we provided an extraordinary and perhaps an experimental power, we limited it to one year, probably on the theory that it was advisable to bring it back into congressional review at least at the end of a year's experiment. I have discussed with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] the proposition that this experiment might similarly be limited to one year and they have presented substantial reasons against it.

I want to inquire, however, whether the Senator from Idaho would resist an amendment making it read "two years" instead of "three years"? It seems to me that it would be advisable to bring the question back definitely and automatically for congressional review in two years.

Mr. BORAH. I should dislike to limit it to two years, but I would consent to limiting it to three years.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That would be some advantage from my point of view; and I move that the amendment be amended by substituting "three years" for "five years" in line 7 on page 2, so that it will read "for a period of three years" instead of "for a period of five years."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BORAH. I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho modifies his amendment as suggested by the Senator from Michigan. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho as modified.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. REED. I send to the desk a conference report on the Army appropriation bill and move its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the conference report be read.

The legislative clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 20, 41, 45, 57, and 86.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 5, 6, 9, 19, 23, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 33, 35, 37, 38, 39, 40, 46, 48, 49, 50, 53, 55, 56, 59, 63, 77, 83, 84, and 85, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "including not to exceed $2,365 for necessary per diem and traveling expenses in connection therewith"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "including not to exceed $750 for traveling expenses, $144,750"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed on amendments numbered 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 32, 54, 60, 62, 79, 80, and 87.

DAVID A. REED,
W. L. JONES,
KENNETH MCKELLAR,
JOHN B. KENDRICK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ROSS A. COLLINS,
HENRY E. BARBOUR,
FRANK CLAGUE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the House of Representatives has yielded to the Senate in the matter of the allocation of mileage to the particular items for which the mileage is necessary. That action has resulted in about 60 amendments, which are embodied in the conference report. I can say in substance that the result is that on the amendment affecting the House provision cutting out 2,000 officers we are still in disagreement, and I understand the amendment will go before the House for action to-morrow, when the conference report shall be acted upon.

We are also in disagreement about the provision which takes away the automobiles assigned to the exclusive use of the Assistant Secretaries of War and a few of the commanding generals. We are also in disagreement about the closing up of the Philadelphia quartermaster's clothing-manufacturing establishment. Those are the three real items in disagreement upon which the House will be asked to act to-morrow.

We are also in technical disagreement on five other items, which involve in a way new legislation within the House rules, but the conferees are fully agreed upon what shall be done, and, I repeat, the disagreement is technical only.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me to ask what was the action of the conferees in regard to the appropriation for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps work?

Mr. REED. The appropriation for that purpose remains exactly as the Senate passed it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether there is on this bill a complete agreement or a final resolution touching matters in disagreement?

Mr. REED. I am informed, Mr. President—of course, no one knows how accurate such information may be—that the other House is likely to yield on the amendments which remain in dispute. That, however, will have to be done by action on the floor. In the conference we have agreed upon every item of importance except only the cut of 2,000 officers and the abolition of the quartermaster's factory in Philadelphia.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I express the hope that there will be some agreement touching those items. The conference report on this bill has been long delayed now as, of course, everyone knows.

Mr. REED. I feel exactly as does the Senator from Arkansas, and I share his hope.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I should like to inquire concerning the action of the conferees on the appropriations for flood control and for rivers and harbors?

Mr. REED. We have increased the amount allowed for rivers and harbors to $60,000,000. We receded from the Senate amendment reducing that amount; and on the flood-control item we reinstated the $32,000,000 provided by the House, increasing the appropriation half a million dollars over the amount voted by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I just wish to say a word. I favor the action of the conferees in regard to the river and harbor appropriations and the other items. I can not get through my head at all the idea of effecting economy by retiring 2,000 officers on three-fourths pay and getting nothing from them in the way of service, whereas by keeping them on full pay we get their services as well.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Florida is exactly right. It is not an economy to pay those officers three-fourths pay for doing nothing; it would certainly be much better economy to pay them the additional one-fourth pay and get full-time service from them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

NOMINATION OF MARCEL GARSAUD

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is pending before the Committee on Interstate Commerce a very important nomination by the President, that of Mr. Garsaud to be a member of the Federal Power Commission. There appeared in this morning's Washington Herald an editorial on the subject which I wish all Senators might read before they act upon that nomination. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the editorial to which I have referred, appearing in this morning's Washington Herald, entitled "Senate Should Reject Marcel Garsaud as a Power Commissioner."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

SENATE SHOULD REJECT MARCEL GARSAUD AS A POWER COMMISSIONER

Every consideration of public interest demands that the Senate reject President Hoover's renomination of Marcel Garsaud, New Orleans Democrat and protégé of the Power Trust, as a Federal power commissioner.

In attempting to jam through a reappointment of Garsaud at the fag end of the session, the administration threatens a base surrender of every inch of ground the public has gained in the water-power fight.

The Power Commission's authority to stop the Power Trust's "watering" of securities and its profiteering in rates has just been sweepingly upheld by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

The next step is for the Power Commission, in accordance with that decision and with its sworn duty under the law, to eliminate the scores of millions of dollars of "water" and padding from $600,000,000 of investment claims awaiting its disposal.

No task calls more insistently for men of absolute independence, of single-minded devotion to interests of the public which are squarely and irreconcilably in conflict with the interests of the Power Trust.

Nothing has been found in Garsaud's record to show that he is such a man; much has been found to indicate he is not.

Of all the five commissioners, he is known to every close observer as the most reactionary. As a witness declared at the hearing on his confirmation, he appears "a stronger advocate of the power companies than the power-company attorneys."

Yet the alignment in the commission is such that on many critical issues he may cast the deciding vote.

Long before his first appointment Garsaud was selected by Electric Bond & Share interests in New Orleans, Senate records show, to be general manager of that city's port.

In that post he permitted these interests to charge the city for electricity in small units, instead of in quantity for the port as a whole, thus compelling the city to pay top rates.

These same interests were among his chief sponsors for appointment to the Power Commission.

In that commission the Electric Bond & Share interests had, and have to-day, rich water-power sites and vast plant investment claims at stake.

Since his appointment Garsaud admittedly has sided with the power companies on the critical issue of the navigability of the New River, an issue which is being made the excuse for an attempt to destroy the water power law.

He has refused to say whether he will allow a municipality a preference over the Power Trust in the disposal of hydroelectric resources, although the law says a municipality shall have this preference.

He joined with two colleagues, on his first day in office, in dismissing Chief Accountant William V. King and Solicitor Charles A. Russell, who had fought unswervingly to enforce honest investment claims and honest auditing. King was later reinstated.

Garsaud has admitted that, as he and certain of his fellows are running the commission to-day, business is transacted through "confidential memoranda between the commissioners, supposed to be seen only by the commissioners."

No one—except the Power Trust—needs Garsaud on the Power Commission.

If President Hoover will not nominate a better man, the commission can function quite effectively with four members until Governor Roosevelt is elected President and appoints real power commissioners.

HOME-LOAN BANKS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho as modified.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in view of the pending amendment I wish to read a short article appearing in the Wall Street Journal this morning containing a statement by Dr. Irving Fisher. I want to read it because it states the position of all responsible economists in every civilized country of the world on the question of the stability of the monetary unit and the management of the credit system.

In the testimony, which is very voluminous, given before the McMillan Commission of Great Britain, almost unanimously the various economists who appeared testified that the main and first duty of those who manage a credit system is to so manage it as to maintain the uniform stability of the monetary unit of the country.

To show how those who are entrusted with the power of controlling and managing the credit system of the United States have failed, I wish to read this statement, because it is self-evident that the United States must give more careful and intelligent study to this very serious question than we have given in the past.

CREDIT ABUSE AND DOLLAR STABILITY

The abuse of credit is an integral element in the instability of the dollar, on whose vagaries of inflation and deflation booms and depressions ride, as upon a scenic railway, states Prof. Irving Fisher. This bad habit of inflation and deflation seems of itself almost enough to account for most of the great crises of the past, he comments.

In the deflation of 1896 the dollar swelled to 150 cents; in the inflation of 1920 it shrunk to 45 cents; in the first deflation following the World War it swelled to 72 cents, and in this second deflation it has further swelled to 112 cents, which is more than one and one-half times its value in 1929, adds Professor Fisher.

"This fact is, in my opinion, the essential one about the depression; the fact that in three short years our dollar has grown to be more than a dollar and a half," he comments.

"This was indirectly due to a general overindebtedness and in turn has made the indebtedness worse, because every debtor has to pay over $1.50 for every dollar he contracted to pay. The farm mortgages are to-day bigger, measured in terms of wheat and cotton, than ever before. Millions of farmers can not raise crops big enough to pay those mortgages They are bankrupt. So are many industrialists. And these naturally stop giving employment to labor. Bankruptcy and unemployment are the inevitable effects of a deflated price level—namely, an inflated dollar."

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, if adopted and put into operation, would undoubtedly to some slight extent remedy the terrific condition that has been brought about by the increase in the value of the dollar based upon its gold value. In my opinion the proposal does not go far enough. The substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], in my opinion, can not add to the Federal reserve banking system powers that it does not already possess and the policy that it has been pursuing now for several weeks of going into the market and purchasing Government securities.

The overwhelming question, if I may, in all modesty, be permitted to say so, for the United States is to give more earnest consideration to the stability of the purchasing power of our monetary unit, so that we may find some way of controlling our banking system, which controls the credit system, so as to maintain a stable monetary unit. We are not now in possession of an honest dollar; we have not had and honest dollar for trade and commerce and agriculture since the establishment of the Federal reserve system. It has failed. Whether it is due to mismanagement or whether it is due to organic defects in the law I do not propose now to discuss. I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to the tragic failure, which, as Professor Fisher says and as the responsible economists of the world will testify, is due largely to the instability of the monetary unit as the result of the failure of the managers of the credit system to maintain its stability.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho as modified. When the question was put previously there was a demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, as we are about to vote, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Dale	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Bailey	Davis	Kean	Schall
Barbour	Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bingham	Fess	Keyes	Shipstead
Black	Fletcher	King	Smoot
Blaine	Frazier	La Follette	Stephens
Borah	George	Lewis	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Glass	Long	Townsend
Broussard	Glenn	McGill	Trammell
Bulkley	Goldsborough	McKellar	Tydings
Bulow	Gore	McNary	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hale	Metcalf	Wagner
Capper	Harrison	Moses	Walcott
Caraway	Hastings	Norbeck	Walsh, Mass.
Cohen	Hatfield	Norris	Watson
Connally	Hayden	Nye	White
Coolidge	Hebert	Patterson
Copeland	Howell	Pittman
Costigan	Hull	Reed

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], as modified.

Mr. REED and Mr. BINGHAM called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what are we voting on?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], as modified.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULKLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I understand, however, that if he were present and voting he would vote as I shall vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SCHALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. I am satisfied that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore cast my vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called). On this question I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I am unable to secure a transfer of my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. If that Senator were present, he would vote as I am about to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HOWELL. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. I understand that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HATFIELD (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have a general pair with that Senator. Not being able to obtain a transfer, I am compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is unavoidably absent. I am authorized to say that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. BAILEY. My colleague the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] is necessarily absent. I am authorized to say that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. HATFIELD. I am informed that my pair, the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON], would vote as I have voted. Therefore I feel that I am entitled to let my vote in the affirmative stand.

Mr. DALE (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]; and

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

I also desire to announce the special pair on this question of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. If present, the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea," and the Senator from Colorado would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—53

Ashurst	Costigan	Johnson	Schall
Austin	Couzens	Jones	Sheppard

Dickinson	Neely	Walcott

So Mr. BORAH's amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 39, after line 19, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, is amended in the following respects:

(a) By striking out the words "one-half of 1 per cent or more" wherever they appear in such act and inserting in lieu thereof the words "more than 3.45 per cent."

(b) By striking out the words "less than one-half of 1 per cent" wherever they appear in such act and inserting in lieu thereof the words "not more than 3.45 per cent."

(c) By striking out the words "more than one-half of 1 per cent" wherever they appear in such act and inserting in lieu thereof the words "more than 3.45 per cent."

(d) By striking out the words "below such one-half of 1 per cent" wherever they appear in such act and inserting in lieu thereof the words "to 3.45 per cent or less."

(e) By striking out the words "and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter" where they appear in section 1 of Title II of such act and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and is otherwise denominated than as ale."

SEC. 2. Any offense in violation of, or any right, obligation, or penalty, or any seizure or forfeiture based upon any provision of the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, or upon any regulation or permit issued thereunder, committed, accruing, made, or incurred prior to the time this act takes effect, may be prosecuted or enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 3. All permits issued under the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, before this act takes effect shall be valid with respect to intoxicating liquor as hereinbefore defined in this act to the same extent as such permits are, at the time this act takes effect, valid with respect to intoxicating liquor as defined by law prior to the enactment of this act.

SEC. 4. Title II of the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 40. All fermented liquors brewed or manufactured, and taxable under the provisions of section 608 of the revenue act of 1918, and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, shall be packed in cases of pint bottles of 16 fluid ounces content, such cases to contain 1 dozen, 2 dozen, or 4 dozen such bottles each. Each case and individual bottle shall be marked, branded, and labeled in such manner as the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury shall, jointly, by regulations prescribe, and all sales by brewers and dealers in fermented liquors shall be in the original package or case so marked, branded, or labeled. Such fermented liquors may be removed from such package or case for use in any public place only by legitimate hotels and restaurants and for the sole purpose of serving such liquors in the dining rooms of such establishments in the pint bottle with meals."

SEC. 5. This title shall take effect at the end of the thirtieth day after the passage of this act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether the amendment has been printed?

Mr. BINGHAM. The amendment has been on the calendar since the 3d of May.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has apparently made certain changes in the amendment which he formerly presented. What I am asking is whether the amendment has been printed in its present form?

Mr. BINGHAM. It has been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in its present form. It was printed just before the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas a few days ago.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The reason why I ask is that I called for a copy of the amendment and was told that it had not been printed.

Mr. BINGHAM. It was printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator inform me the page of the RECORD where it is to be found?

Mr. BINGHAM. I can not answer the Senator offhand as to just where it will be found.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut what alcoholic content his amendment contemplates?

Mr. BINGHAM. I was about to state that this amendment is in the exact form in which the bill was reported from the Committee on Manufactures on the 3d of May, as recommended by the minority, with a single exception that instead of the Volstead Act phrase, "one-half of 1 per cent by volume" it substitutes "3.45 by volume," which is 2.75 by weight.

I stated the other day, when the Senator was absent from the Chamber, that I put it at 3.45 per cent because throughout the Volstead Act and throughout the national prohibition laws the alcoholic percentage is always given by volume. I realize that what the Senator has offered is 2.75 by weight, but that is exactly the same as 3.45 by volume.

I also stated, while the Senator was absent the other day, that I had changed it at the request of the chairman of labor's committee on the modification of the Volstead Act, in order that there might be no conflict, and in order that we might get a vote at this time on the question of modifying the Volstead Act at a point clearly, and in the Senator's own opinion, as stated in the RECORD on page 14752, at a percentage which brought it under constitutional limitation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. In just a moment. I also put it in this form because the matter was studied, at my request, very carefully by the Legislative Counsel of the Senate during the period prior to its first introduction, which was nearly two years ago, and they went through the laws very carefully and prepared the amendment in the form in which it has been offered, in such a way as to take care of every situation which might arise under the prohibition laws. So that the amendment is rather long and somewhat complicated, but it means only one thing; that is, that wherever in the national prohibition law the words "one-half of 1 per cent" occur, we put in lieu thereof the equivalent of what the Senator has been trying to get.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand, the amendment as now projected, as far as alcoholic content is concerned, provides for the same amount as in the substitute offered four or five days ago by Senators WALSH, BULKLEY, and myself, namely, 2.75 by weight.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. So that if the Senator's amendment is adopted, in effect it is a 2.75 by weight proposition, except that he uses the language "by volume" instead of "by weight"?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I say to the Senator that he will certainly have my support for his amendment, and I trust that others on this and the other side of the aisle will likewise give him support.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator. It was in order to meet the Senator's view, and in order to meet his statement that what he and his colleagues were trying to do was to bring the percentage within the limitations of the Constitution, that I changed the provision. I realize that it does not sound as good to the professional drys, because it is 3.45, but it is exactly the same as 2.75.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator reintroducing the beer amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. I stated the other day—but the Senator from Louisiana, not being familiar with parliamentary practice, did not understand the matter, but made a characteristic address in regard to the withdrawing of the amendment—that the sole object of withdrawing the amendment was not, as stated by the Senator from Louisiana, for some political advantage, but purely to secure a parliamentary advantage, namely, a direct vote upon this question. The Senator from Idaho, having come to the relief of the drys on the other side of the aisle who did not want to vote on this question, had offered as a substitute for my amendment an amendment which has now been agreed to, which had nothing whatever to do with the bill, agreed to by a very large majority, not germane to the bill at all, an amendment providing for what might be called a certain amount of easy money. That has now been agreed to as Title II. The amendment to which he offered it as a substitute I had to withdraw in order that it might not die a parliamentary death upon the adoption of his amendment. I withdrew it so as to be able to offer it now again. Of course, if any Senator wants to rise and offer another substitute for it to becloud the issue, I shall have to withdraw it again, but I hope that the Senator will help me to secure a direct vote on this amendment.

Mr. LONG. I am going to vote with the Senator, but I just wanted to know whether this amendment would be withdrawn.

Mr. BINGHAM. It will be withdrawn if any Senator offers another amendment to becloud the issue, I state frankly to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Would the Senator be willing, for the sake of expedition and saving time, to yield for the purpose of allowing me to propose a unanimous-consent request that we may vote on the amendment at once, without debate?

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall be very glad to yield for that purpose. I have no desire to debate it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed at once, without debate, to vote on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, reserving the right, I object to a statement made by my learned friend from Connecticut in which he said that certain gentlemen on this side were trying to avoid a vote. If there be anything of which the Democratic Party can be accused it is not cowardice. Nobody in that party here is afraid to vote at any time.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is splendid, and I hope that the subsequent proceedings will carry out the Senator's statement.

Mr. ASHURST. Another thing, before the Senator obtains his unanimous-consent request to vote, I want to know, first, how much money or revenue this proposal would put into the Treasury if it were adopted. Secondly, is the alcoholic content which the Senator proposes to put into beer, intoxicating in the ordinary sense of the term?

The Senator owes it to the Senate and to the country to stop accusing this side of attempting camouflage. He owes it to himself, because he is a trained debater, to tell us how much revenue his amendment will produce and to submit proof as to whether or not 2.75 is intoxicating. If it is not intoxicating, then under the Constitution and under the Democratic platform plank Senators may vote for it. If it be intoxicating, Democratic Senators may not vote for it without violating their own platform plank and the Constitution as well.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in answer to the two questions asked by the Senator from Arizona, permit me to say that, in the first place, it is estimated by those better qualified to know than I am, whose word I am willing to take, that it will probably add to the revenue of the Government more than $300,000,000 a year.

In the second place, in answer to the Senator's question, I may state that personally I was led to believe by the scientists who testified before the Committee on Manufactures, which had this question before it for several months, that beer containing even 4 per cent by volume, or 3.02 per cent by weight, was not intoxicating.

For many years I have been urged by persons knowing my opposition to the eighteenth amendment to introduce a modification measure. I had felt that no modification measure that might under the Constitution be adopted would be satisfactory. It was not until one day when the newspapers published a rather long statement by Prof. Yandell Henderson, professor of physiology and applied physiology in Yale University, in which he stated that in his opinion as a noted world-renowned toxicologist, beer was not intoxicating, that I began to believe that we might get somewhere with modification. In view of his statement made to the press, he was the first witness invited before the committee; and he was cross-examined and criticized at considerable length, as the Senator can see by referring to the long hearings before the committee. We also called various professors of physiology and of medicine and various physicians before us, and it was their testimony that even 4 per cent could not properly under the Constitution be held to be intoxicating.

The statement of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], who was a member of the Democratic convention, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who was a member of the platform committee, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], who was also a member of the platform committee, and their decision, when the Democratic platform went on record as favoring immediate modification of the Volstead Act for the manufacture and sale of beer or other beverages which could be manufactured under the Constitution, that in their opinion the reason why they offered this amendment containing the reference to 2.75 per cent was to bring it within the Constitution, led me to realize that the only way to get immediate action on a matter which I believe to be of great importance, was to sink my own opinion and adopt their views in the matter. Therefore, I have placed in the amendment which I have offered that percentage of alcohol which those who wrote the Democratic platform and they themselves believe to be entirely consonant with the Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It seems appropriate, in view of what has taken place on the floor in the last few minutes, to state that a motion to refer the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut to the Committee on the Judiciary will be made, for the purpose of having an inquiry by that committee into the alcoholic content of intoxicating beverages, particularly as it relates to beer. I want the Senator to be informed of that fact.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator desire to make the motion now?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will make the motion now, if the Senator will yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me just a moment before that is done?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I want to read something which may interest the Senator from Arizona, if I may have his attention. I am thinking particularly of the Senator's suggestion that beer is not intoxicating, and just for what it is worth I would like to read into the RECORD at this point a news item appearing in the Baltimore Sun of the 5th day of this month, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, July 5, 1932]

CHILD, 4, INTOXICATED ON BEER, FALLS DOWN AND INJURES HIS HEAD

A 4-year-old boy yesterday became intoxicated on beer and fell down, injuring his head.

The beer was given to the child by his father, northern district police reported.

After being treated at the hospital, where he was taken by a neighbor, the boy was returned to his home.

That may be enlightening in view of what has been said on the subject.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Before making the motion, if the Senator will indulge me to make a brief statement, I am perfectly aware of the fact that there is great diversity of opinion as to what amount of alcohol constitutes an intoxicating beverage with respect to beer. I know such differences of opinion will continue. While I can not speak from experience, and I know that the Senator from Connecticut can not do so either, it has been my observation that some persons can carry a great deal more alcohol than others, that some persons can carry a great deal more alcohol at one time than at other times, and that some persons seemingly can not get enough to make them fall down so they can not rise.

There is a good-faith question involved which I think some have overlooked in connection with the matter. That is the question of what constitutes an intoxicating beverage—what amount of alcohol makes beer intoxicating. It is for that reason that I propose to make the motion to refer the amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary. I am perfectly willing to vote for permission to manufacture beer that is not intoxicating. I do not know what amount of alcohol makes beer intoxicating. It is not certain that anyone else here knows. I realize that if a man is in a hurry to get beer, the fact that it may be intoxicating does not lessen his haste. Many people who want beer want it because they hope it will be slightly intoxicating. If the scientific question can be determined with approximate accuracy there would be no objection to an immediate vote on the Senator's amendment. But in view of all the circumstances, and they have been detailed day after day during the course of the present session of Congress, I feel that the sensible and practical thing to do is to refer the question to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] asked the Senator from Connecticut what amount of revenue would be received under his amendment. The Senator stated, as I recall, $300,000,000. The amendment as I read it does not carry a revenue provision, probably for the reason that the Senate has not the power to initiate a revenue measure. Undoubtedly if beer be legalized a tax will in time be imposed upon it and some revenue will be received from it, but the adoption of the amendment and the enactment of it into law will not yield one dollar of revenue, will it?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes. I should not have stated that had I not been aware of the fact that on the statute books today is an act, which has never been repealed, which provides $6 a barrel tax on beer. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in his testimony before the committee, stated there would be no difficulty in collecting the tax and that they could begin to collect it the day after the act was passed. It does not require any new revenue legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is that a tax on nonintoxicating beer?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is a tax on all beer above one-half of 1 per cent alcoholic content.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. So that automatically the tax would go into effect if the amendment should be adopted?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes. In reply to the Senator's question of a moment ago, the Senator will find the amendment printed at page 14851 of the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I have it now before me.

Mr. President, I now move that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BINGHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield for a question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I desire to enter a motion, upon which I do not insist, but I want to enter it nevertheless, for the discharge of the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the resolution introduced by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], repealing the eighteenth amendment through the medium of State conventions. I ask that the motion may be entered.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think the motion was entered this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] entered a similar motion.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Arkansas is entirely within his rights in making the motion. He stated the other day that he would make it, and I suppose that is the nearest we can come to an actual vote on the question at this session. It is a great disappointment to those of us who believe that there is nothing that can be done which would help the revenues of the Government more, that would help business more, which would help social conditions more, and which would help temperance more than the passage in the near future—in fact, immediately—of such a modification of the Volstead Act as might be made under the Constitution.

Mr. President, the motion to send the matter to the Judiciary Committee is a motion which will simply throw the whole question over the election and into next December, when anyone who has safely been elected for a period of six years in this body may comfortably vote for a modification of the Volstead Act if he believes, according to the wishes of the country as expressed on the first Tuesday in November, that that is the general view of the people in his State.

Mr. President, may I say, in the first place, in regard to the necessity for such action by the Judiciary Committee, that the matter has already been fully gone into by a committee of the Senate. When I asked the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] more than a year ago to take up the so-called beer bill that was before his committee, which was introduced a year ago last December, and have hearings on it, it was in order that we might get evidence to find out what is the alcoholic content of a beverage that might be legal under the Constitution. It was not possible for him during the last session of Congress to call a meeting of his committee for that purpose, but early in the present session of Congress he did appoint a subcommittee, the chairman of which was the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], and every opportunity was given to both wets and drys to produce testimony as to whether beer with an alcoholic content of 4 per cent or otherwise could be held to be intoxicating. No committee, not even the Judiciary Committee, could go into the matter more fully than did that committee. All the time they needed was accorded to the opposition, the dry forces. A distinguished group of physicians and scientists was brought together either in person or by letter.

Furthermore, with the idea that some day this very question might arise, we put into the record at the very beginning the affidavits offered to the United States Supreme Court in a celebrated case as to the intoxicating quality of what is known as war-time beer, 2.75 per cent beer, which is nothing more nor less than the kind of beer called for in this amendment. At that time when the matter came before the Supreme Court neither the Government nor anybody else made the slightest effort to prove that 2.75 per cent alcoholic content beer was intoxicating. The question was outside of the discussion because nobody contended for a minute that it was intoxicating. In fact, one of the reasons why war-time beer was placed at 2.75 per cent was that it was practically impossible for any one to drink enough of it to become intoxicated. The question was brought before the Supreme Court and those affidavits were submitted. The Government did not contend for a moment that 2.75 per cent beer was intoxicating. All the Government contended was that the Congress was within its rights when it declared that anything, buttermilk or ginger ale, or anything else containing more than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol, was an intoxicating beverage, and the Supreme Court said that the Congress is within its rights in so declaring.

Mr. President, I submit that if the Congress was within its rights in declaring one-half of 1 per cent of alcoholic content of buttermilk or ginger ale to constitute an intoxicating beverage, which every one knows it is not, Congress would be entirely within its rights to declare 4 per cent alcoholic content to be nonintoxicating even though there are some who doubt it. But of course it is obvious that Congress is not going to do any such thing. However, no question was raised in regard to 2.75 per cent beer.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Democrats who follow him will not get anywhere, will not get anything except delay by sending this matter to the Judiciary Committee for action. The Judiciary Committee, forsooth, is the last committee that is interested in the question. They have had at least a score of important measures before them in regard to repeal of the eighteenth amendment and modification of the Volstead Act since the first days of December. Have they reported any of them back to the Senate? They have not. Why have they not? I have been told that the reason is that the subcommittee having the matters in charge, when a meeting was called in order that some bill might be reported back to the full committee, could not get a quorum. Why could they not get a quorum? It was because the drys, forsooth, refused to attend the meetings, and as there were three drys on the committee and only two wets, the two wets who were present could not vote and could not get a quorum. When the drys on the committee were asked why they did not attend the meetings they replied that the matter was not of sufficient interest to require their attendance. That is the committee to which the Senator from Arkansas wants us to refer this important matter.

The Committee on Manufactures, under the able guidance of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], has considered this matter. Long hearings were held upon the question. Those hearings are now contained in a 600-page volume which is on our desks and is available to any Senator. There was no question in their mind about the intoxicating quality of 2.75 per cent beer. The only question was as to the intoxicating quality of 4 per cent beer. I appeal to those who really desire to decide the question not to send it back to the Judiciary Committee, which has successfully pigeonholed all measures concerned with prohibition since the 1st of December, including even a very simple and very reasonable bill permitting physicians to prescribe beer.

It is not generally realized that under the Volstead Act physicians may prescribe whisky; they may prescribe brandy; they may prescribe wine of any quality, provided they do not prescribe to exceed a certain quantity in 10 days; but they may not prescribe beer. There is something about beer that causes it, in the mind of the ardent prohibitionist, to be considered as being untouchable; the very touch of a glass of beer to the lips of a convalescent is so poisonous that physicians are not permitted to prescribe one glass of beer a day for him. They may prescribe a glass of whisky or so a day, and that does not make bad habits; that does not poison the patient; that is not a menace. They may prescribe two glasses of wine a day; certainly that will not poison the patient; it will not hurt him; it is a medicine; but if the physician desires to prescribe a bottle of beer a day, as he used to do in the case of many convalescent patients, oh, no; that is untouchable; that will poison the patient; that will not help anybody's health. Yet before the committee we had the opinion of the American Dental Association that nothing would be of greater help to the development of children's teeth in the period of babyhood than to permit the nursing mother to have a bottle of beer a day. However, Mr. President, I shall not argue about that further. That is merely one of the bills that have been permitted to slumber in the Judiciary Committee, to which the Senator from Arkansas now desires to send this amendment for further slumbering.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am obtaining information. This is the first time I ever heard of beer being prescribed for dental benefits. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Senator would only read the hearings, he might learn much more.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will probably read them, if I can get the opportunity.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not desire to embarrass anyone, but I submit that those of us who sincerely believe in the immediate modification of the Volstead Act and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment had a right to suppose that when the Democrats at their great convention in Chicago so overwhelmingly went on record in favor of immediate modification that they meant what they said in their platform.

In that document they refer to many different matters, but the word "immediate" is only used three times, once in connection with governmental economy and twice in connection with prohibition.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BULKLEY. I quite agree with the Senator that the word "immediate" means immediately—now—it does not mean immediately after the election. However, it does not necessarily mean immediately without consideration by a committee. The Senator will appreciate that when the Democratic platform was drawn at Chicago it was impossible to say exactly what percentage of alcohol makes a beverage intoxicating within the meaning of the Constitution. If we had known exactly what percentage is intoxicating we would have said so frankly in the platform, just as everything else is set forth frankly in the platform, so far as possible.

Mr. BINGHAM. Of course, the Senator from Ohio and I are on exactly the same ground in this regard. He is one of those who signed the minority report in favor of 4 per cent beer.

Mr. BULKLEY. If the Senator will permit me a moment more, I agree exactly with the Senator from Connecticut that 2.75 per cent beer is not intoxicating, and for my part I am ready to vote on the proposition now, and I intend to vote against the motion to refer, but I realize that some Senators do not feel as thoroughly convinced as do the Senator from Connecticut and I. And I realize that they may have reasons for wishing further consideration and a more authoritative report from a committee. I recall that the majority report of the subcommittee, in which I joined the Senator from Rhode Island in favor of reporting the Bingham beer bill, was not approved by the full committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the Senator from Ohio signed the minority report of the full committee, which is on the calendar, and I admire him for it, because the testimony which he heard during the long period of time that the committee held hearings convinced him as it convinced others that 4 per cent beer was not intoxicating.

Mr. BULKLEY. The testimony was absolutely convincing to me.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in order to show how unnecessary this motion is, may I call attention to the fact that from pages 6 to 23 of the hearings on this proposed amendment of the prohibition act there are contained affidavits signed by a number of distinguished physicians with regard to 2.75 per cent beer. May I say further that there was not a single affidavit presented or a single statement made by anyone, even by the drys, in the committee hearings to show that 2.75 per cent beer was intoxicating.

The first affidavit, found on page 6, is by Dr. Hobart Amory Hare, of 1801 Spruce Street, Philadelphia. I will not read the entire affidavit, but merely the ending of it, which states:

> From these personal experiences and observations and considerations of the literature on the subject I am of the opinion that beer containing not to exceed 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight is not intoxicating under the legal definition of that term.

Then follows the affidavit of Dr. John Marshall, professor of chemistry and toxicology in the medical school of the University of Pennsylvania. His affidavit concludes with the words—

> IX. In view of the foregoing, I would not consider that beer with an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent by weight should be regarded as an intoxicating beverage.

Then there follows the affidavit of Dr. Smith Ely Jelliffe, graduate of Columbia University with the degrees of M. D., A. M., and Ph. D., who first served as interne in St. Marys Hospital, Brooklyn, and later in hospitals of Vienna, Paris, and London. He has been licensed to practice medicine in New York since 1889. I quote from his affidavit as follows:

> VI. From my personal experience and investigation and from observations made upon others, as well as from my study of the experiences, investigations, and experiments recorded by others in the scientific literature of many countries, I am of the opinion that beer or any beverage which contains not to exceed 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, when consumed by an ordinary man or woman, in such quantities as the human stomach can ordinarily hold, is not intoxicating.

Then follows the affidavit of Dr. William John Gies, a physician in the city of New York, professor of biological chemistry in the school of medicine of Columbia University, who concludes a long affidavit with the words:

> I am therefore of the opinion that beer of alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent by weight is not an intoxicating beverage.

Then follows the affidavit of Dr. Abraham A. Brill, licensed to practice in the State of New York, graduate of New York University in 1901, and from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City in 1903, for five years assistant physician at the Manhattan State Hospital for the Insane, fellow of the New York Academy of Medicine, a member of the American Medical Association, and so forth. He concludes his testimony as follows:

> VI. I am acquainted with the substance now known and sold as "war beer" both from my own consumption of the same and from being in company of others who have drunk it, which substance, I am informed and verily believe, has an alcoholic content not to exceed 2.75 per cent by weight, and from my experience and observation I am of the opinion that such beer which is now made and sold would not tend to cause inebriation or alcoholism in any average, normal adult drinking the same, but on the contrary it exerts a very beneficial effect, and in my opinion it would be impossible for any such person to drink a sufficient quantity of this substance to cause drunkenness.

His testimony is further substantiated by that of Dr. James J. Walsh, a physician residing at 110 West Seventy-fourth Street, New York City, who says:

> V. I have personal experience with the "war beer" now being sold and which I am told contains 2¾ (2.75) per cent of alcohol by weight, and I have noted its mildness, and though I rarely use alcoholic beverages personally, and am very susceptible to the action of alcohol, I have felt scarcely any effect from this beer other than that of a refreshing beverage. From my personal experience, and as a physician, I do not consider beer containing 2¾ (2.75) per cent by weight of alcohol an intoxicating beverage.

I might read from the testimony of others, Mr. President, but I do not desire to prolong this debate. I merely want to say that there is an abundance of testimony that beer of such alcoholic content is not intoxicating; the Government did not maintain it was intoxicating in a case before the Supreme Court; and there is nothing whatever to be gained, from the viewpoint of the modification of the Volstead Act, by sending this amendment to the Judiciary Committee.

It has been fully considered by the Committee on Manufactures, and an abundance of testimony has been taken. Nothing can be gained—oh, I am mistaken about that, for something can be gained; delay can be gained; avoidance of a vote on this direct question can be gained, and avoidance of embarrassment to the Democratic Party can be gained, because the Democratic platform calls for immediate modification, and "immediate" obviously means now; but we are not to get it now because the leader of the Democratic Party on the other side of the aisle wants the amendment sent to a committee which has shown its ability to handle such questions by having a number of such measures before it for six months without making a single report on any of them. It is quite obvious that the plank of the Democratic platform calling for "immediate modification" is a myth. It is a myth on which the Democratic Party proposes to go on its way this fall.

It is quite appropriate, Mr. President, that the candidate of the Democratic Party is now going to cruise along the coast of southern New England, which everyone knows is wet, and wants immediate repeal and immediate modification. He is going to sail along the Connecticut coast and the Rhode Island coast and Massachusetts coast on the "myth." It is very appropriate, Mr. President, that the candidate of the Democratic Party should have embarked from New York yesterday morning on the 40-foot cruiser Myth II. Where the first "myth" came in, of course, I do not know, but I point out that there is clearly a "myth" involved in this matter. The Associated Press dispatch dated New York, July 9, and published in the newspapers of yesterday states:

> But trailing the 40-foot Myth II—
>
> The 40-foot Myth; that is pretty good, Mr. President—> will be the trim 90-foot Ambassadress, a sea-going cruiser which will have as passengers a long list of Democracy's kingpins.

Oh, yes, Mr. President; there are going to be a lot of Democrats who are going to trail up to New England on the heels of this Myth. The dispatch goes on to say—

> Once a day the Ambassadress will come alongside the Myth—
>
> Once a day the Ambassadress will come alongside the Myth!

Mr. NORRIS. Is not that often enough?

Mr. BINGHAM. The dispatch continues—> and Roosevelt's thoughts will be brought back to his campaign.

Once a day the Democrats on the Ambassadress looking for jobs, looking for a chance to win the election, are going to come up alongside the Myth, the "myth" of immediate modification of the Volstead Act, and there will be a few moments' discussion with the candidate of the Democratic Party; but, as the dispatch so well says, "Roosevelt's thoughts will be brought back to his campaign."

Mr. President, there could not be found a more satisfactory boat for the Democratic candidate on which to go into New England than this Myth. Whether it will fool the voters or not, remains to be seen.

I appeal to the Senator from Arkansas to let us have a vote on this question. There never has been the slightest doubt in the minds of any physicians or scientists who have testified before any committee that 2.75 per cent beer was nonintoxicating. We have had all the hearings by the committee that we need. We have given every one a chance to be heard.

The report is here; the hearings are before us. Of course, if the plank in the Democratic platform calling for immediate modification of the Volstead Act is a myth—and it is really a "myth" in two senses on which the Democratic candidate is going up into New England—this amendment might as well go to the Judiciary Committee, which can be trusted to shelve it and pigeonhole it for another six months, so that it will not, until after the November elections shall have been held, rise to plague those souls who are afraid to go on record as favoring what might by some persons be considered to be a "nearer" beer, a little nearer than that which is now obtainable; in fact, such beer as was recommended by those who wrote the plank in the Chicago convention. Evidently it is desired that they be not embarrassed until next December, even if then; for, knowing the Judiciary Committee and the manner in which it handles matters of this kind, I doubt very much if we will get a report in time to have it voted upon during the short session. I hope very much that this motion will not prevail and that we may have an opportunity to vote directly on the question.

Mr. President, inasmuch as full hearings have been held upon it and that the testimony is overwhelming in favor of the amendment before us, of course, we know that anyone who votes to send it to another committee, not interested in submitting a report, as was the Manufactures Committee, is voting because he does not want to have the matter immediately considered nor to have the Volstead Act immediately modified.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I should not have another word to say on the subject before the Senate except for the obvious fact that the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] is conducting his senatorial campaign here on the floor of the Senate, and is not nearly so much interested in having beer as he is in having himself reelected by endeavoring to draw in question the sincerity of the Democratic Party on the matter of modifying the Volstead Act.

In order that my own attitude may not be mistaken in any respect, I want to remind the Senate again that I was among those who are catalogued as "drys" who have felt all along that the Volstead Act went far beyond the requirements of the eighteenth amendment in many of its vital provisions. Therefore, I conceived the idea that we should, once for all, have a definite and scientific ascertainment of the alcoholic content of an intoxicating beverage. For that reason I drafted the amendment to the deficiency bill in the Senate which appropriated a quarter of a million dollars and put it at the disposal of the so-called Wickersham Commission for the very purpose of having that commission make an honest and a searching investigation of the problem, and reporting the result of such investigation with its recommendations to the President, and having the President transmit that report to the Congress with his recommendations, as promised in his speech accepting the Republican nomination for the Presidency.

Month after month went on without the Wickersham Commission giving one particle of attention to the primary purpose of that provision of the deficiency bill which enabled it to be erected and to proceed with its inquiry. Eleven months after the passage of the bill, with its appropriation, the Wickersham Commission had paid more for one piece of furniture in its establishment than it had appropriated to the use of this investigation. For one single piece of furniture it had paid more of the $250,000 than it had appropriated to the use of the real investigation with which it was charged.

Not only so, but the chairman of that commission, Mr. Wickersham—I call it the "Wicked sham commission" rather than the "Wickersham Commission"—made a speech in the State of the senior Senator from Connecticut in which he utterly and textually decried the very idea that the commission was primarily or particularly charged with the duty of investigating the prohibition problem; and the President of the United States three weeks afterward, before an annual meeting of the Associated Press in New York, stated textually that the prohibition problem was "a mere segment" of what was proposed to be done by the Wickersham Commission, indicating that he minimized to the last degree the purpose of Congress in seeking to ascertain what was the fault with the Volstead Act, and why it could not be enforced. In all that period nobody ever heard the senior Senator from Connecticut raise his voice here in protest against this obvious dereliction of the Wickersham Commission. Not a word did he say to provoke this commission to perform the duty that we had in mind when we appropriated $250,000 for its purposes. His reelection was so far off at that time that it never occurred to him to play politics with this question, and to get us an authenticated decision as to what really constitutes the alcoholic content of an intoxicating beverage.

I pointed out on the floor of the Senate that this commission had, in cost to the taxpayers of the country, consumed three times as much food at the Mayflower Hotel as had been the cost of its investigation of prohibition; but not a word from the senior Senator from Connecticut about hurrying up a modification of the Volstead Act, or about the proper alcoholic content of an intoxicating beverage.

As stated, I felt that the act should be modified in that respect, and in other vital respects. The eighteenth amendment does not undertake to deal with medicinal alcohol. The eighteenth amendment does not necessarily authorize the Congress to circumscribe in a severe and, as a professional authority says, in a ruinous way how much liquor a physician may prescribe for his patients. The eighteenth amendment does not say that you may not, except through an impossible process, get alcohol for culinary purposes, to season food. In those and other respects I felt that the Volstead Act should be modified; but we had no assistance from the senior Senator from Connecticut at that time.

Not only that, but as the years expired, and as the revelations and the consequent discontent with the operation of the eighteenth amendment progressed, I felt that the people should be given an opportunity again to say whether or not, in the light of all these events, we should retain, repeal, or modify the eighteenth amendment.

Accordingly, I drafted a declaration for the Virginia Democratic State platform calling for the submission of the question to the respective States in conventions assembled long before either the Republican or the Democratic National Convention convened; and that is my attitude to-day. I am willing right now, without another minute's delay, to vote to submit the question of repeal or modification of the eighteenth amendment, preferring to reserve authority to prevent both the Federal Government or the States from licensing a return of the saloon or permitting shipment of liquor from wet to dry territory.

Now as to the declaration of the Democratic platform, upon which the senior Senator from Connecticut seems to have staked his reelection to this body, I utterly deny that that convention had a right to speak for any Congressman then elected or any Senator here under oath and obligation to discharge his duty according to his judgment and his conscience. If for anybody at all, it had the right to speak only for those candidates for the United States Senate and those candidates for the House of Representatives to be chosen at the ensuing election. Therefore, I experience not the slightest embarrassment, personal or political, upon the questions that have been discussed here.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. In a moment.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; I yield now.

Mr. BINGHAM. I merely wanted to ask whether it was the Senator's general understanding of platforms that they bound only that one-third of the Senate that might be coming up for reelection?

Mr. GLASS. I do not think it bound anybody except the delegates who voted for it.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is a very interesting statement.

Mr. GLASS. It is interesting, but it is my position.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I say to the Senator that I sympathize with his position, and I hold the same position with regard to my own vote.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator is bound by the Republican declaration, why should he have picked upon the Democratic declaration? Why did he not immediately or "promptly"—which is not different—submit here, and insist upon its passage, a proposal to repeal or modify the eighteenth amendment as declared by the Republican platform?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have on the desk a resolution which will do that, and I shall move to take it up at the first opportunity.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, which "will" do it. What degree of appropriateness is attached to the Senator's effort to lay stress upon the Democratic declaration when he is a Republican? Why does he not lay some stress upon his Republican declaration, and why does he not take some action on it?

Mr. BINGHAM. We will take it just as soon as we get a chance, Mr. President.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and we will take action on the Senator's proposal just as soon as we ascertain what is the proper alcoholic content of an intoxicating beverage.

Mr. BINGHAM. In other words, when a commission makes up its mind about something which it probably will never make up its mind about.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I would rather accept the mind of that commission than to accept the mind alone of the Senator from Connecticut. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I am accepting the mind of the Democratic National Convention in this matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Connecticut is very subtle in his comment upon these hearings. There is more importance to be attached to what he omits than there is to what he has stated with reference to these hearings.

I took the care and the time the other night and the succeeding day to go over these hearings. I challenge any man with a fair disposition and a clear mind to read them and not say that they were deliberately projected to reach the conclusion which the Senator from Connecticut has reached.

His own witnesses say that they were summoned here at his suggestion. Nobody can read the hearings without reaching the conclusion that these particular persons, if experts they be, were summoned here after the Senator from Connecticut had ascertained in advance what their testimony would be. And even his own experts failed to sustain his position, as I shall show.

His particular expert, a young scientist from the alma mater of the Senator from Connecticut, Doctor Henderson, testified, when he ventured to say that 2.75 per cent beer was not intoxicating, that he had reference to "adult, healthy persons who had been accustomed to the use of beer." That is far from meaning that a beverage of that degree of alcohol would not be intoxicating to people who were not adults and who have not been "accustomed to the use of beer."

What, then, would the Supreme Court of the United States determine when the problem should be presented in that aspect? Would it unqualifiedly sanction a beverage which, according to the Senator's own witness, might intoxicate a minor, or might intoxicate a mature person who had not been accustomed to drinking a pint or more of beer? Doctor Henderson also testified that to avoid intoxication the beer must be drunk after meals and not before. In short, a person must first get his stomach full of food before taking on his beer. What would be the decision of the Supreme Court on that remarkable phase of the question?

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, let me attend to the Senator from Connecticut for a while.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. GLASS. Then I may give my attention to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. Very well.

Mr. GLASS. I do not mean to be discourteous, because the Senator himself is always so courteous that I could not be otherwise.

Mr. GLENN. I understand that. I thank the Senator. I realize he is having quite a busy task attending to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. GLASS. We shall see. The Senator from Connecticut says that nobody will say that 2.75 per cent beer is intoxicating. Right here in his own printed hearings, on page 451, is presented the testimony of Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, chief chemist of the United States Department of Agriculture for 25 years. I do not need to tell the Senate who Doctor Wiley was. He stood in the front rank of the eminent chemists of this country, if his name was not entitled to be first of them all. He said:

> Beer, which is a malt liquor containing 2¾ per cent alcohol by weight, which equals 3.3 per cent alcohol by volume, has a sufficient amount of alcohol to intoxicate an average person in the quantities often consumed.

Will the Supreme Court accept the testimony of Doctor Wiley or that of the inexperienced Senator from Connecticut when it comes to determine the questions which can only be determined in the laboratories of the chemists?

To a like effect were presented affidavits from Prof. George C. Higley, of the chemistry department of the Ohio Wesleyan University; Dr. William Geagley; Dr. Howard A. Kelly, still one of the eminent physicians of this country, at Johns Hopkins; Dr. Abel R. Todd; Dr. W. A. Evans, former professor of pathology of the University of Illinois Medical School and former commissioner of health at Chicago.

There appeared before that committee Doctor Bevan, testifying as an expert, to say that 2.75 per cent beer was intoxicating.

The Senator's own witness again, Doctor Henderson, said that it would not render a man incapable of talking or of locomotion; in other words, it would get him on the verge of intellectual idiocy; it would get him on the verge of a down and out, but not quite. He would be a "near" drunk instead of an absolute drunk.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Supreme Court of the State of Virginia, in a case under consideration regarding the intoxicating nature of 2.75 per cent beer, said:

> Doubtless the legislature took cognizance of the well-known fact that the minimum per cent of alcohol in what is commonly known as beer is 2¼, and even this, the weakest form of beer, has been found to be intoxicating, and on this account arbitrarily fixed upon this percentage as the differential between beer and the class of "near beer," and gave to the latter class the name of "malt beverage."

Mr. President, in determining this question for myself, shall I accept the decision of the supreme court of my State rather than a hasty and vociferous declaration of a party platform adopted by a convention where not one particle of testimony was taken as to the alcoholic content of an intoxicating beverage?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the party platform does not prescribe any percentage. What is the Senator's objection to the party platform?

Mr. GLASS. I object, in the first place, to a State giving a Republican majority of 1,500,000 in the last election undertaking to tell the State of Virginia that nobody is a Democrat who is not in favor of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. I object to that in the platform.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, what was the Democratic majority in Virginia in the last presidential election, may I ask?

Mr. GLASS. Unhappily, it was not anything at all. As I had occasion to say to the Governor of Massachusetts, once in 60 years Virginia voted wrong, and once in 70 years Massachusetts voted right. [Laughter.] Not many times has Connecticut voted right, because Connecticut to-day has not a republican form of representative government.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, of course I intended my question to refer to the so-called beer plank in the platform, not the platform generally.

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. BULKLEY. I want to inquire seriously whether the Senator really thinks there is anything in the platform that is not justified on the subject of beer. It does not specify any percentage at all. It simply says such percentage as is permissible under the Constitution.

Mr. GLASS. There is no fault to be found with that; that is my attitude, "as is permissible by the Constitution," but I refuse to accept the opinion of the Senator from Connecticut as to what is constitutional.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is what I understood; but I was afraid the Senator was saying something about the platform that was not quite accurate.

Mr. GLASS. No; I could not say anything disagreeable to my colleague about that.

Here is an opinion in the printed hearings of the Senator from Connecticut, which was available to him, by the Supreme Court of Georgia. They said:

> In light of common knowledge as to the amount of beer that may be drunk, it would be absurd to refuse to recognize that a beer containing as much as 4 per cent of alcohol is capable of being drunk in such quantities as to produce "intoxication" as defined above. A pint of such beer would contain nearly as much alcohol as an ounce and a half of hundred proof whisky.

The first proposition of the Senator from Connecticut was 4 per cent. He could just as readily, upon the basis of 4 per cent, complain that we are not carrying into effect "immediately" the Democratic platform, as he may upon his 2.75, which means 3.3. Are the Senators from Georgia bound by the Senator from Connecticut or by the supreme court of their own State in the determination of what is the alcoholic content of an intoxicating beverage?

Other cases cited before the committee, appearing in the printed record, showed clearly that the weight of judicial authority is largely in favor of the contention that beer of the alcoholic content urged here is intoxicating.

Dr. Arthur Dean Bevan, a graduate of Yale in science and arts, a graduate in medicine from the Rush Medical School and head of the surgical department in that institution, as well as of the Presbyterian Hospital at Chicago and a fellow of the American Medical Association, a student for years in beer-drinking Germany, in testifying before this committee called attention to the fact that the "best piece of nonpartisan evidence on the question of alcohol" that he had ever seen was the report of the Board of Liquor Control in England, made in 1915–16. He stated the board was composed of medical men, pharmacologists of eminence, and that the report of this board furnished "one of the best pieces of evidence that I know of in regard to the fact that beer will produce drunkenness."

Senator HATFIELD called attention to the testimony of Doctor Miles, a very eminent authority on the subject, who had made what is very likely the most comprehensive scientific inquiry, saying:

> There is not any room for doubt in reference to the toxic action of alcoholic beverages as weak as 2.75 per cent by weight. If 27.5 grams of alcohol are taken in this form, a well-defined and measurable depression in physical and mental processes is not far short of the same result found when from 21 to 25 grams of alcohol are taken in solutions varying from 14 to 25 per cent.

Had I any disposition to consume the time of the Senate, I could read item after item of testimony presented before the Senator's committee which undermines his contention. The only member of his subcommittee who has ever spent five minutes in a chemical laboratory, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], who has been for years a practicing physician, took a position absolutely contrary to that taken by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I was about to ask the Senator from Virginia whether the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], who is a chemist, concurred in the opinion of the Senator from Connecticut, who is a great many other things but is not a chemist.

Mr. GLASS. He dissented teetotally from the position of the Senator from Connecticut not so emphatically as I do, because I have a great deficiency of disposition and emotion, I confess, when it comes to discussing questions, but Senator HATFIELD, well versed in the subject, absolutely dissented from the position assumed by the Senator from Connecticut. So that at this moment the Senate is not in possession of any authentic information that would enable it intelligently to determine whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut would not be declared invalid by the Supreme Court of the United States, in which event we would have had our labors for nothing and have spent our time in a perfectly futile thing.

I am willing, and have been ever since I offered my amendment to the deficiency bill, to have a scientific inquiry upon this question.

I am perfectly willing to vote for any beverage which under the provisions of the eighteenth amendment I would feel confident the Supreme Court would sustain, but I am not willing, merely because the Senator from Connecticut wants to play petty politics with the problem by impeaching the good faith of the Democratic Party, to vote for the proposition which he presents here without any adequate or convincing authority of a professional or acceptable nature.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I merely want to protest against the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia that impeaching the sincerity of the Democratic Party is playing petty politics. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, before it can be determined whether a particular form of beer is intoxicating, it is necessary to know what intoxication is. Not one of the experts called by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] gave us a technical, scientific definition of intoxication. They referred to intoxication "in the general sense of the term" or "in the general acceptance of the word." One of his experts went so far as to say that a man was not intoxicated as long as he could walk or talk.

As a matter of fact, intoxication means the toxic or poisonous effect of a liquor or of a drug upon the tissues of the brain or other tissues of the body, and that effect may be in dangerous operation long before a state of visible drunkenness or visible intoxication has been reached. A review of the testimony of the Bingham experts showed they evidently had in view visible intoxication or visible drunkenness as the meaning of intoxication. At any rate, they did not give us a technical definition of the term.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. On page 33 there is a very clear definition by Prof. Yandell Henderson, of Yale University, in which he stated:

> By an intoxicating beverage is properly to be understood one which contains such a percentage of alcohol that the amount of it which a person would consume, in its ordinary use, would induce either a marked temporary disturbance of physical condition and behavior or cumulative ill effects.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Exactly—visible physical condition.

Mr. BINGHAM. No one ever supposed that one could be intoxicated without it being visible.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Oh, yes; that is the point exactly. Intoxication means a toxic or poisonous effect upon body tissues, and that toxic effect may be, as I have said, in deleterious operation long before any visible state of drunkenness has been reached. Indeed, the chief danger of intoxicating liquor and the drink habit lies in the effect upon moderate drinkers, who take alcohol in moderate amounts and who may never throughout the course of their lives show signs of visible drunkenness.

The Senator from Connecticut said the Government did not make an official pronouncement as to the meaning of intoxication when the case involving the constitutionality of 2.75 per cent beer was before the courts. In fact, the Government had established an official definition. The eighteenth amendment prohibited intoxicating liquor but did not define it. It became necessary for Congress, in passing the enforcement act, the act known as the Volstead Act, to define intoxicating liquor, and what did Congress find? It found that the Federal Government, in connection with the war-time prohibition act of November 21, 1918, through the Treasury Department, had ruled in Treasury Decision 2788, paragraph 14 (b), issued on February 6, 1919, that a beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume would be regarded as intoxicating. Congress found further that 35 States, wet and dry, had defined intoxicating liquor and in doing so had adopted half of 1 per cent or a lesser standard. The wet States had found it necessary to define intoxicating liquor in connection with the regulation of the liquor traffic. The dry States had found it necessary to define intoxicating liquor in connection with the prohibition of intoxicating liquor. Seventeen States had decided on the basis of practical experience that liquor with any trace of alcohol was intoxicating. Eighteen States decided that one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcoholic content made a liquid intoxicating.

Mr. President, the prohibition movement was chiefly aimed at beer because it was the principal form in which intoxicating liquor was sold and consumed in pre-prohibition times. The old-time saloon beer ranged in alcoholic content from 1.7 per cent to 7 per cent. Two and seventy-five hundredths per cent beer constituted a large portion of the beer sold in saloons and against which the prohibition movement was mainly leveled. What Senator with any respect for his official oath to support the Constitution can consistently vote to legalize a beer undoubtedly intoxicating? Beer having one-half per cent or more of alcoholic content is intoxicating liquor. Beer with one-half per cent or more of alcohol is forbidden by the American Constitution as it now stands.

When the ravages of alcohol are denounced, beer is included. When we say that alcoholic drink is a menace to mankind, the form of alcoholic drink known as beer is included. When we say that alcohol in the shape of a beverage is a habit-forming drug, replete with danger to human beings, to free and intelligent government, and to civilization itself, beer is included.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] asked about the revenue to be derived from beer. Let me call his attention to the following facts: In order to construct the necessary plant and equipment to produce beer enough to bring $300,000,000 in revenue, a capital investment of $900,000,000 would be required. We would have to subtract $900,000,000 from the capital sources of the country in order to construct sufficient plant and equipment to sell enough beer to produce, at the rate proposed, $300,000,000 of revenue. Furthermore, the American masses would have to consume $1,200,000,000 worth of beer in order to produce that revenue. These vast amounts would have to be expended in order to obtain $300,000,000 of revenue for the Government. Is not the price too dear to pay?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. No matter how large a sum of money might be raised, and no matter how sadly we might need the revenue, if it be unconstitutional we would not be justified.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am making the argument at this time solely from the financial viewpoint. In order to produce $300,000,000 of revenue the American people would be called upon to spend about $1,200,000,000 for beer, and capital sources would suffer to the extent of $900,000,000. All this money must come out of the pockets of the people and the country's capital sources.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Reed
Austin	Dale	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Dickinson	Kean	Sheppard
Bingham	Fess	Kendrick	Shipstead

Connally	Hatfield	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Hayden	Nye	Watson
Copeland	Hebert	Patterson	White
Costigan	Howell	Pittman

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to refer the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope Senators are not so weary that they will be disgusted if I take a few moments of time on the pending motion.

I do not believe in all the United States there was anyone who in better faith and with greater desire for success followed the prohibition cause than did I. It is not my intention now, Mr. President, to enter upon a discussion of the liquor traffic; but away back, as far as I can remember, at least during all the years of my manhood, I have had a feeling of disgust for that traffic. I have seen it in all its despicable phases. I have seen it grow and expand and get into politics from Washington down to the little village. I have lived under various kinds of laws, including local option, the voters of the community deciding every year whether or not they should permit saloons to be licensed. I have also lived under laws which authorized the license system. Long before we had State prohibition in my State I participated in various discussions and elections applying to separate localities. I participated in the effort to have a prohibition law put into operation in the State where I lived. I was anxious that a prohibition amendment should be put into the Federal Constitution. I supported it loyally; I supported it with the belief that it would be successful. When the amendment was put into the Constitution and the Volstead law was passed, although I realized then that its enforcement would be difficult I was hopeful and believed as fervently as I believed anything that after a few years of trial it would be universally obeyed and would be a success. I have seen in my lifetime communities which had saloons vote them out; I have observed the dissatisfaction of some of the best citizens, who, in the very best of faith, believed that the licensed saloon was better than prohibition; and, as time went on, I have seen those men change their views and concede that prohibition was successful. I thought it would be that way in the Nation.

I cried out from the housetops against putting the enforcement of the national prohibition law into politics. I have made many speeches in the Senate in which I denounced putting the appointment of prohibition-enforcement officers in the hands of politicians; but, as time went on I could see—and it seemed to me if I wanted to be fair even with myself I could not help but see—that the law was not accomplishing what I thought it would accomplish. My disappointment was bitter. Any change of attitude I have experienced has come reluctantly, against my wishes and against my will. However, I do not want to close my eyes to the fact, which, it seems to me, must be admitted by fair-minded men, that the enforcement of the prohibition amendment has not been successful. I can now see that in many respects conditions under enforcement in some localities seem to be worse, if there could be anything worse, than those under the old saloon. I know of other localities where I think prohibition can fairly and honestly be considered successful.

As time went on I think we improved the law. We made an effort to take its enforcement out of politics; we put the appointment of prohibition officers under the civil service. Again I had no doubt but that would be successful. I wish to digress here, Mr. President, to say that I believe the fairest attempt to enforce prohibition that has been made, so far as I am able to see, has come under that law and under this administration. Abuses which appeared to me to be sufficient to cause the failure of any law have to a great extent been remedied; but I have proclaimed in my campaigns and from many a rostrum that if, after prohibition had what I believed it was entitled to, a fair, honest trial, it then was apparent to me that it was not a success, I would be willing to vote for a modification of the law.

I did not believe that prohibition was an experiment; I thought it was going to be a reality; but I must confess, Mr. President, that after all these years of watching I have reached the conclusion that prohibition is not a success. I have recently said that, having reached that conclusion, I would vote for a modification of the prohibition law. When I say that, Mr. President, I mean it so far as I am concerned; I am taking that position in as good faith as I ever supported the prohibition law.

I realize that I do not know and can not tell in advance whether modification would be a success or a failure. In other words, I have reached the point where I am willing to admit that any modification of the Volstead Act which we may enact will be an experiment. I do not like to try experiments in government if I can help it; but I have such a hatred for the old system, the nature of which many of those who have recently come into manhood and womanhood do not realize, that I am willing, rather than go back to the saloon, to try an experiment, to do the best we can, to make such change as may be necessary in order to prevent, so far as possible, the use of alcoholic liquors as a beverage. Feeling that way, Mr. President, I would not vote now to repeal the eighteenth amendment, although, to be fair, I must say if we try other experiments and fail, I may reach the time that I would so vote. I have not reached it as yet; I still have hope that out of it all we may, to a great extent, save the situation.

The eighteenth amendment is not self-enforceable; without any law to enforce it it would be a dead letter. If to-day we should repeal the so-called Volstead Act, and enact nothing in its place, the eighteenth amendment would be a dead letter. When we passed the Volstead Act—and I was a member of the Judiciary Committee that considered it; I was not only a member of the committee which considered it but I was also a member of the subcommittee to which it was referred—I did not agree, I remember, with some of the legal propositions that were laid down before that subcommittee.

I was convinced by the hearings that I had an erroneous idea of the law; and when I looked up the decisions of the courts, and particularly those of the Supreme Court of the United States, and followed their reasoning, I was not so sure but that if I myself had been passing upon the law I might have reached the same conclusion; at least I reached the conclusion that the provisions which we put in the Volstead Act were constitutional and that we had a right to adopt them under the eighteenth amendment. We included, however, in that law a definition of intoxicating liquor which I believed then and I believe yet, and I think almost everybody else agrees to the proposition, covers beverages that are in fact not intoxicating. I refer to the limitation as to alcoholic content. That law has, however, been upheld by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Whether right or wrong, Mr. President, I have reached the conclusion I have stated; and at the beginning of this session of Congress I do not believe anyone thought there was going to be any real attempt made either to repeal the eighteenth amendment or to modify the Volstead Act, although a great number of resolutions were introduced for repeal and a good many bills were introduced to modify the Volstead Act. Perhaps I did not perform my duty, but it is true that I did not give those measures any serious consideration. I believe that is true of a large majority of the Members of this body. The reason I did not give them consideration was because I thought they would not reach the stage where they would be seriously considered by the Senate. All Senators know that, considering the important legislation that is continually coming before the Senate and its committees, particularly, I think, before the Judiciary Committee, many other measures will not be brought up for serious consideration. We consider and devote our time only to those measures which we feel in all probability will come before the Senate for decision, and doing that takes more time than any of us have. That is my excuse, my apology if an apology be necessary, for not giving serious consideration to any of these propositions.

However, it became my duty, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to appoint subcommittees. I referred these questions to one subcommittee. I selected a committee of five. I appointed the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], a wet, as chairman of that committee. I put two Members who, to use the ordinary expression, are known as wets on that committee, and three Members who are recognized as drys.

I am not complaining of that subcommittee for not reporting to the full committee, which they never have done. I believe that those members thought, as I did, that there was going to be no serious attempt to pass upon any of these matters at this session of Congress. Every one of them was overwhelmed with work, and I am not finding fault with members of that subcommittee who did not attend all the hearings, because they felt, as I know I would have felt if I had been on the subcommittee, having a large amount of other work to look after, that I would not be able to properly attend to those matters upon which I was going to be called to act if I gave my attention and my time to listening to the interminable speeches that would be made before that subcommittee.

That being true, Mr. President, I do not feel competent now, in the closing days of this session, to begin a study of this subject with a view of passing upon a law modifying the Volstead Act. Everyone must recognize that it is a very important proposition. It has within it some very close constitutional legal questions, and to satisfy myself as to how I should vote, I should want to give it a great deal of attention that I have not given it.

Having reached the conclusion that I am going to favor some modification, I do not want to become hysterical and jump at a conclusion and vote for some half-baked, ill-considered legislation, and I do not intend to vote for anything of that kind until I have had time and until the Senate has had time to go into the details of any law of modification.

I hope we can modify the Volstead Act, that we can liberalize it in some respects, and still maintain a condition of law and law enforcement that will do away, perhaps, with the present illegal and bootlegging activities and still prevent the return of the saloon. At least, as I said a while ago, Mr. President, I have reached the conclusion that I am willing to make the trial.

I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. Will the Senator tell us what the Supreme Court has said on this question respecting the intoxicating qualities of beverages within the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. The Supreme Court has sustained our law.

Mr. HATFIELD. Did the court state what would be permissible in the way of an alcoholic content under the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. No. The Supreme Court have not told us how much farther they might go, or whether they would go in the other direction or not.

Mr. HATFIELD. I am just wondering if the Senator has read of the experiments carried on by Dr. Walter R. Miles at the Carnegie Institute Laboratory in March, 1924?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I have not.

Mr. HATFIELD. May I read the result of them to the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. It will not be pertinent to what I have to say, but I have no objection to the Senator reading it.

Mr. HATFIELD. Just a paragraph.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. After an investigation by this scientific man, he concludes as follows:

> There is no longer room for doubt in reference to the toxic actions of alcoholic beverages as weak as 2.75 per cent by weight. If 27.5 grams of alcohol—
> Which is about 416 drops—
> are taken in this form, the well-defined and measurable depression in physical and mental processes, judged within the limits of this investigation, is not far short of the result found when 21 to 28 grams of alcohol are taken in solutions varying from 14 to 22 per cent.

Dr. Walter R. Miles is the only scientific investigator up to the present time, so far as I know, who has expressly stated and completely proven that 2.75 per cent of alcoholic content, diluted, on a full stomach is toxic.

If Doctor Miles's experiments are correct, then no modification increasing the alcoholic content of a beverage to 2.75 per cent or more would be legal under the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator. I do not want to go into a discussion, because I am not qualified to do it, as to what is intoxicating and what percentage of alcohol would make a beverage intoxicating. I think it is generally understood that when we defined intoxicating liquor, as I said a while ago, as containing a certain amount of alcohol we included within it beverages that were not in fact intoxicating. We have been sustained by the Supreme Court in doing that. Therefore, suppose—and I do not know that this is the qualification thatI would seek; I am just using it as an illustration, rather offhand, too—suppose we gave another definition of intoxicating liquor under the Volstead Act and defined it so that we excluded some things that were in fact intoxicating and we defined them as nonintoxicating. Would the Supreme Court sustain that? Would they make the rule work both ways? If so, does it not open an avenue wherein we could modify the Volstead Act and perhaps—those who are behind the movement claim it will; they may be right; I do not know—perhaps relieve the question of the terrible conditions that now confront us under the present law?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Committee on Manufactures in its hearings had before it a very distinguished lawyer from Baltimore named Oscar Leser, who brought out the point that in the Volstead Act we do not actually say that one-half of 1 per cent is intoxicating. We say that the penalty and prohibition shall apply to everything containing one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. He said we would be perfectly within our rights under the Constitution in repealing the Volstead Act. Then there would be no enforcement at all. He also said that we could make the penalty apply to anything that we choose; we could make it apply to something that had 25 per cent of alcohol, and that would be constitutional.

Mr. NORRIS. I was coming to that, Mr. President—that probably under the decision of the Supreme Court we could, if we wanted to, provide for different degrees of penalty. We could provide one punishment where a person sold liquor containing 10 per cent of alcohol, and another and different punishment for a person who sold liquor containing only 5 per cent of alcohol. All that avenue is open, it seems to me; but I am not sure just how far we might go under these decisions. I am not satisfied myself, if I were permitted to draw the law, just where I should place it. Not knowing just what ought to be done, if we can change the content of alcohol and increase it and thus do away with the illegal bootlegging and the disgraceful things that have been going on in our great cities, I am willing to try it and see how it works. If it does not work, we can repeal it or change it. I think we ought to do that before we repeal the eighteenth amendment and take away our jurisdiction.

I listened with great interest, as I always do, to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. He referred to the so-called Wickersham Commission. When the first announcement came out, and it was discovered that the commission had united in a report, and then everyone had written a dissenting opinion to it, it seemed to me that it was the laughing-stock of the country. Later on, however, when I got time, at different times, I read every one of those opinions, and I confess that I was wonderfully impressed by some of them. Some of them were written by men whom I knew personally to be just as firm and honest in favor of prohibition as I was myself. I did not have the advantage of listening to the evidence. That is one great mistake that the commission made, in holding its hearings in secret; but those who did hear the evidence have reached conclusions, as you all know, that were about equal in number to the number of members on the commission.

All this I say, Mr. President, in preparation for the statement which seems to me to be logical, seems to me to be fair, and seems to me to be right, that we are not in condition now to pass intelligently upon any proposition to change the Volstead Act. It ought to go to a committee. I do not care whether it goes to the Judiciary Committee or not, but it ought to be given as careful consideration as the original act was given.

I wanted to say this much before voting upon the motion to refer the matter to a committee.

I am not interested in the partisan political question that is involved that may move some Senators to their activities. I am not interested in what the Democratic Party said in what seems to me to be a very plain proposition, that they were in favor of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the immediate change of the Volstead Act. I think I know what it means. That is one eulogy which I want to give to that platform which I can not give to the Republican platform. Nobody knows what the Republican platform means. Not even God could tell what it means. None of those things have any effect upon me as far as this question is concerned. I want to keep out of it now, as I always have, all partisan political considerations.

I do not follow the Senator from Connecticut when, on every occasion—Sundays, week days, night, and mornings—at every opportunity he offers a beer bill somewhere to somebody for consideration; and if he backs it up with his partisan political arguments, with trying to put somebody else in the hole while he keeps himself out of it, that is immaterial to me.

My good friend from Connecticut dreams about beer. He thinks about beer. He is probably an expert; and I am not competent to contradict his evidence, although I would rather let somebody else be heard, at least, before I vote. But beer seems to be the sole law of his heart—beer now, and always, and forevermore. If my good friend dies some day, as I fear he will, and if he goes to Heaven, as I know he will—when St. Peter opens the pearly gates the Senator from Connecticut will refuse to go in unless he can have a bottle of beer under each arm. [Laughter.]

I do not believe that this heckling of the members of one party by the members of another, one party trying to get advantage of another is conducive to the passage of a right kind of law. It may be that sufficient evidence has been produced. I have not read the evidence, I have not seen it. It may be that the subcommittee presided over by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] has produced all the evidence that is necessary. But we can not consider that now, and we have not considered it yet. We have now reached nearly the middle of the hot season in Washington, everybody knows we are going to adjourn in a few days, and I believe the country, as far as beer is concerned, will be in existence next December.

If this amendment goes to the Committee on the Judiciary, of course it means the end of it at this session of Congress. Because I am not prepared, and I do not believe that most of my associates are prepared, to vote upon this important question now without some more investigation and consideration, I am going to vote to refer the amendment to the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I think it is due the Committee on the Judiciary, and the subcommittee thereof which considered the resolutions and the bills relating to the prohibition question, to state what the record discloses regarding the hearings on those measures.

There were 15 bills and resolutions referred to the subcommittee. In examining those resolutions and bills I find that the resolution introduced by the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] was not referred to the subcommittee. That probably was due to some oversight.

After those measures were referred to the subcommittee the chairman, myself, informally began to inquire when it would be desirable to hold hearings. It will be recalled that hearings on prohibition were being held before a committee of the House of Representatives, and the particular bill which the Senator from Connecticut now offers as an amendment to the pending bill was referred to the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate, and a hearing was in progress upon that bill for some time.

After conferring with some members of the subcommittee and conferring with people who were interested and who were advocating the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the modification of the Volstead Act, I came to the conclusion that the committee ought not to begin its hearings until the House committee had completed its hearings, and the House had had an opportunity to vote upon the question. There were very valid reasons for coming to that conclusion, which I need not state.

I found also that the hearings before the Committee on Manufactures had been quite extensive respecting the modification of the Volstead Act, but that committee had not reported. I did not feel that we would be justified in deferring the hearings before the subcommittee of which I was chairman until a committee report was made by the Committee on Manufactures. Therefore, in the latter part of March last I called a hearing formally, and set the hearing for April 14, it being necessary to give at least two weeks' notice, or a little more than two weeks' notice, to both sides, to the proponents and the opponents, because I proposed to give both sides an equal opportunity to be heard and to have full hearings, in order that no one should be denied an opportunity to be heard before the subcommittee.

However, there were pending before the House committee bills relating to the prescribing of medicinal liquors. A hearing was held before the House committee on the 6th of April. I was absent from Washington, and the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] wired me and asked me if it would be convenient to hold a meeting of my subcommittee on the 7th of April in order to accommodate those gentlemen who appeared before the House committee. I therefore fixed the date of hearing on the bills providing for amendments to the medicinal provisions of the act on April 7.

On April 7 there were present the following members of the subcommittee of which I was chairman: The chairman and Senator HEBERT, of Rhode Island. Our subcommittee held hearings for eight days, and I will give the attendance on those eight days. I have given it for the first day.

The next hearing was on April 14. The members of the subcommittee in attendance at that time were the chairman, Senator HEBERT of Rhode Island, and Senator WALSH of Montana.

On April 15, the following day, the same Senators were present as members of the subcommittee, the chairman, Senators HEBERT and WALSH of Montana.

On April 19 there was present the chairman alone.

On April 20 there was present the chairman alone.

On April 21 there was present, on the occasion of the hearing by the subcommittee, the chairman only.

On May 10 a hearing was held to permit Minister Morehead to testify before the committee, and the committeemen present on that occasion were the chairman and Senator WALSH of Montana.

On May 17 there were present the chairman and Senator WALSH of Montana.

Subsequent to those hearings, and very shortly thereafter, due notice was given to all members of the subcommittee that a committee meeting would be held, the time and place of the meeting were designated, and the purpose of the meeting was designated. The purpose of that meeting was to consider the various bills and resolutions, with a view of reporting to the full committee.

At the time the meeting was held those present were the chairman, myself, and the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT]. The two members of the subcommittee, of course, had no authority to report to the full committee.

After waiting a due time, and a considerable time, and no other members of the subcommittee appearing, the subcommittee adjourned. Afterwards I had some informal discussions with some of the members of the subcommittee, and it very clearly appeared to me, and to those members with whom I had informal discussions, that there was no chance for the subcommittee to have a quorum present, and no chance for a report upon any bill or any resolution. The subcommittee, therefore, could not function, it was unable to report on any bill or resolution, simply because the subcommittee could not have and did not have a quorum. As chairman, I was in attendance at all meetings of the committee.

Mr. President, I make these brief remarks for the purpose of having in the record the facts, without any comment upon those facts.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, in the issue of June 29 of the religious journal known as the Christian Century, which is published in Chicago, a publication that is well known to be edited by what we would call free-lances in religion, and whose editorial policy has not been very friendly to this administration, especially to the President, there appears an editorial in reference to the Republican plank on the prohibition question. It is too long to read, and I do not want to take any time. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Century, June 29, 1932]

THE HOOVER LIQUOR PLANK

Though the dry leaders are in retirement—as the press states—awaiting the results of the Democratic convention before making any statement on the Republican liquor plank, we see no reason why an opinion should not be given instantly. To do so it is necessary to lift the plank out of the platform and consider it quite apart from other Republican policies. To approve the liquor plank by no means implies approval of the rest of the platform, or of the Republican party, or of Mr. Hoover. All other aspects of the political situation must be considered on their merits. To say this is to emphasize the importance of considering the liquor plank on its merits also, rather than with the bias of partisan opposition or partisan favor toward Republican policies in general. Our opinion of the Republican plank on liquor is that it should be gratefully received and approved by every reasonable dry; likewise by every reasonable wet. This is not said facetiously or ironically. The longer the Republican plank is studied the more will it commend itself as fair to both sides, constitutional in method, and patriotic in purpose. It formulates a plan for the resubmission of the liquor question in terms which prescribe a just formula under which the issue is to be submitted, leaving untouched the merits or substance of the issue itself.

Though the Republican proposal is for resubmission, its essence is that it proposes to control the formula of resubmission. And this is the all-important matter. If two men contemplate engaging in a public debate on any subject, both are rightly concerned as to the terms in which the proposition is formulated. They are on opposite sides of the question, but they well know that the proposition must be framed so as to bring out the essential difference between them and to divide the responsibility so that one is not left, for instance, under the necessity of affirming a negative, or the other with no responsibility at all but to pick flaws in his opponent's affirmative argument. The resubmission of the liquor question will be a huge nation-wide debate. Probably no such debate has taken place in our history—certainly not the debate on slavery which never came to a peace-time issue, but was decided in war; nor that on free silver, which did not involve so deeply the popular emotions as that which the revival of this issue is sure to precipitate.

The drys will be ready for it.

Their only concern as they look forward to it is that the issue shall be so formulated as to lay upon both sides the responsibility of constructive, affirmative thinking. Enlightened drys have for some time been coming to the position that public policy now demands that the question be taken back to the people for a fresh mandate. If this mandate goes against Federal prohibition, it goes without saying that prohibitionists will abide by the law. If it goes in favor of Federal prohibition, the task of enforcement will be greatly simplified. We have heard of no defender of the eighteenth amendment who does not subscribe to the general principle that the people have the right to be heard, and we know of but few who would question the opportuneness of a popular expression now; that is to say, as soon as the constitutional process can present the issue to Congress and then to the States.

The sole difference of opinion between wet and dry resubmissionists has been with respect to the formula upon which the people would be asked to vote. Readers of the Christian Century need no elaboration of this point at this time. They must have observed with some degree of reassurance the instant acceptance and wide circulation of the thesis first presented in these pages in two editorials. "The Wet Strategy" and "The Dry Strategy," in which the paramount importance of the formula of submission was pointed out. Continuance of prohibition versus repeal as a formula for the people to vote upon was, we argued, a dangerous trap—not only dangerous to prohibition but certain to elicit an irresponsible decision from the electorate. Such a formula would capitalize the impatience and disgruntlement of the public mind without confronting the voter with an alternative or substitute for which he was willing to be responsible. To resubmit the liquor question under such a formula would be playing the game with loaded dice.

Against that formula was placed this: Continuance versus a specific substitute. The wets were challenged to name a specific substitute for Federal prohibition designed to lay upon the voters the responsibility not only of repealing the present law but of affirmatively declaring what they desired in its place. This the wets would not do. They came to the Republican convention determined to push through a formula of flat repeal. They were blocked in this strategy by Mr. Hoover himself. The plank which he authorized and which the convention passed declares: "We do not favor a submission limited to the issue of retention versus repeal," and then proceeds to set up in general terms a specific substitute upon which both Congress and the electorate may vote intelligently and responsibly as between the substitute and the eighteenth amendment.

The Republican plank is neither wet nor dry; it does not deal with the merits or substance of the liquor issue. Neither is it "moist." Nor yet is it in any sense a "straddle," or an evasion of the issue. The party takes no position on the merits of prohibition or on the desirability of change. It explicitly states that "no public official or member of the party should be pledged or forced to choose between his party affiliations and his honest convictions upon this question." The party does favor resubmission, but it refuses to prejudice or influence the outcome. It puts itself in the rôle of an umpire, concerned that the great game of resubmission shall be played fairly and responsibly, not recklessly and indecisively. The Republican Party promises that if it wins the election next November it will see to it that an amendment to the Constitution designed as a substitute for the eighteenth amendment will be introduced in Congress and, if it passes Congress by a two-thirds vote, submitted to the States for ratification or rejection, a vote of three-fourths of the States being required for its ratification. If it fails to pass Congress or, passing Congress fails to be ratified by the States, the eighteenth amendment remains in force. If and when it is ratified the eighteenth amendment will be no longer in force, being supplanted by the new amendment.

And the Republican plank specifies what the substitute amendment shall contain. It provides for the inclusion of three important features. One is the retention by the Federal Government of "power to preserve the gains already made in dealing with the evils inherent in the liquor traffic." That is a vague statement so far as the "gains" are concerned, but the inclusion of the principle of Federal authority is specific enough and marks a distinct advance over the Federal impotence of preprohibition days. Another is State option to be wet, if a State so desires, but subject to Federal authority guaranteeing against the return of the saloon. A third is the guaranty of Federal protection for States that elect to be dry against the invasion of their territory by the liquor traffic from wet States. These three things are specifically promised in the new amendment.

We say above that the Republican plank should be satisfactory to the wets as well as to the drys. We do not see how any reasonable and patriotic wet can reject Mr. Hoover's plank. To reject it is to betray not only a spirit of unfairness but hypocrisy and lack of patriotism. The three features which the plank proposes for the new amendment were taken right off the lips of the wets. The wets claim, for example, that they do not desire the return of the saloon. Very well. It devolves upon them to propose and defend a concrete plan which will guarantee that the saloon shall not return. They also assert their devotion to State rights as against Federal prohibition, claiming that a State must be allowed the right to be wet or dry according to the will of its own people. Very well. It then devolves upon them to assume responsibility for a concrete plan designed to protect the States that wish to be dry from invasion by the liquor traffic legalized in the wet States.

This just responsibility the Hoover plank lays upon the anti-prohibitionists. It refuses to allow the great debate to begin either in Congress or the States under a reckless and irresponsible formula, such as retention versus repeal. But if the proposed substitute wins in Congress and is ratified by the States, the eighteenth amendment will be thereby repealed—no wet or dry should have any illusion on that point. Federal prohibition will be a thing of the past and a new method of liquor control will be set up in its place. No honest wet whose mind is not befuddled with bigotry can therefore reject the Republican formula as unfair or unreasonable. For him to insist upon his formula of retention versus repeal gives the lie to his protestations against the return of the saloon and in favor of State's rights.

It is important to keep clearly in mind that the liquor plank is a platform document, not a draft bill ready for introduction in Congress. It will be a highly interesting and delicate task to draft the amendment which will embody the features set forth in the platform. Speculation as to the method by which liquor can be legally manufactured and sold in a wet State without the return of the saloon is already beginning. The sophisticated drys who have thought into this thing much further than have any of the wets are already smiling up their sleeves as they envisage the Republican Senators and Congressmen trying to write this feature into their bill and at the same time keep the Government out of the liquor business! It is quite all right to smile, but this is not the time to laugh out loud. There will be time enough for that when the amendment is introduced into Congress. If it does not provide against the return of the saloon, it will be attacked on the ground that it does not keep faith with the platform promise. If it does obviate the saloon, but only by putting the Government, either National or State, into the liquor business, it will be attacked on that score. It is incredible that the traditional public feeling of the American people has changed with respect to such an alliance of liquor and Government.

The point is, that the Republican plank sets up a substitute, a good substitute—indeed it is, in our judgment, one of the very best substitutes that could be formulated. It will have a better chance to win against the eighteenth amendment than any constructive substitute that has emerged. Whether it is a practicable substitute or not need not now be debated. The time to debate that will be after the Republicans win the election, if they win it, and when they set about to fulfill their promise by drafting an amendment containing the features which they have specifically and explicitly defined.

But the drys who find satisfaction in the formula under which the Republican platform proposes to resubmit the liquor question, must bear in mind that their approval of the formula does not tie their hands in the slightest degree, even if the amendment eventually presented to Congress keeps faith with every item of the platform promise. The platform commits no one—no voter, no Republican, no Senator, no Congressman, not even the President who put forward the plank—to vote for the substitute amendment when it is presented. It is perfectly consistent to give approval to the substitute as a fair and responsible alternative to the eighteenth amendment, and then to vote against it. We repeat that the plank does not touch on the merits of prohibition as the method of dealing with the liquor traffic. All it does is to demand that the people who wish to vote to repeal the eighteenth amendment shall be held responsible for saying what they propose to put in its place. The Republican Party has now defined the substitute which it will present as an alternative, but it does so in the interest of a fair vote and an intelligent one, not with any commitment to one or the other alternative. If the Democratic Party takes a position in favor of naked repeal, they stand in danger not only of losing the support of the irreconcilable drys but of all open-minded citizens who desire to bring about a constructive solution of the liquor problem.

The fact is that the real battle will begin only when the draft amendment comes before Congress. It will be a battle between the eighteenth amendment and the new amendment. Congressmen will hear from their constituencies on the question. There will be a campaign of education on the liquor question that will cast into the shadow all the campaigns of the past. Leadership will emerge which now we do not see. The defenders of Federal prohibition will not be on the defensive. They will conceivably carry the battle into repealist territory, by examining the proposed amendment, disclosing its implications, comparing the results that are likely to flow from it with conditions existing under prohibition, pointing out the bootlegger in the woodpile of the substitute scheme, and exposing the inevitable corruption of our political system by the return of the legalized liquor traffic even under the method of control which the substitute presents. We say "conceivably" this will be the case. It surely will be the case unless the drys shall have been in the meantime persuaded to abandon their fundamental contention that there is no way to deal with the liquor traffic but to outlaw it.

But after the substitute amendment shall have passed Congress by two-thirds vote—if it does—there will then come the most intense phase of the battle. The States will then prepare to vote in conventions specially called for this purpose. The selection of the delegates to these conventions will be no routine matter! Perhaps a period of two years will be required for the States to register their will. There thus lie before us a possible two and a half years from the date of the election next November in which to study the issue, to educate public opinion, to mobilize and release into action the forces on both sides, and to register public opinion in the State conventions.

Rightly to judge as to the significance of the Republican liquor plank, it is necessary to transport oneself into the conflict of the 2-year period—it may be much longer—and from that point of view look back to the Chicago convention where the formula of resubmission was wrought out. From that future point of observation it will be seen that Mr. Hoover's plank was an achievement of high statesmanship in the interest of true democracy and national well-being.

It is perhaps unwise to venture a prediction. But we have long felt that when once the issue is joined under a fair and responsible formula, the promoters of the present wet hysteria will stand amazed at the undreamed-of resources upon which the drys will draw, in church, and home, and school, and factory, to keep the Nation from slipping back a single step in this the most significant effort at voluntary social self-control which history has ever known.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the debate, but there has been brought to my attention—and this will take me only two or three minutes—a very interesting bit of official information regarding what constitutes an intoxicating beverage.

During the war there was a proclamation of President Wilson on September 16, 1918, in which, in order to preserve foodstuffs, he gave notice that no person could use sugar, corn, rice, or any other foods or fruits to make any kind of beverage, including near beer. The use of any such foodstuffs for the manufacture of anything for beverage purposes was prohibited under that proclamation.

Then, by a proclamation dated January 30, 1919, he said that, whereas the prohibition and use of grain in the manufacture of beverages which were not intoxicating had been found by the President to be no longer necessary in order to secure an adequate and continuous supply of food, he modified the previous proclamation made on the 16th day of September, 1918, to the extent of permitting the use of grain in the manufacture of beverages which were not intoxicating, and that was the time when the brewers were permitted to manufacture 2.75 beer, which was held by the Democratic administration at that time to be a nonintoxicating beverage.

I ask that the proclamation may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the proclamation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—A PROCLAMATION

[Amending proclamation of September 16, 1918, prohibiting manufacture of malt liquors]

Whereas, under and by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, the President, on the 16th day of September, 1918, made a proclamation, containing the following prohibition:

"I prescribe and give public notice that on and after October 1, 1918, no person shall use any sugar, glucose, corn, rice, or any other foods, fruits, food materials or feeds, except hops and malt now already made, in the production of malt liquors, including near beer, for beverage purposes, whether or not such malt liquors contain alcohol, and on and after December 1, 1918, no person shall use any sugar, glucose, corn, rice, or any other foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds, including malt, in the production of malt liquors, including near beer for beverage purposes, whether or not such malt liquors contain alcohol."

And whereas the President, under authority of the said act of August 10, 1917, by further proclamation dated January 30, 1919, modified the said proclamation of September 16, 1918, so as to permit the use of grain in the manufacture of beverages which are not intoxicating, such proclamation providing as follows:

"Whereas the prohibition of the use of grain in the manufacture of beverages which are not intoxicating has been found by the President to be no longer essential in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food:

"Now, therefore, I do hereby modify the aforesaid proclamation made on the 16th day of September, 1918, to the extent of permitting the use of grain in the manufacture of beverages which are not intoxicating."

And whereas for the production from a cereal base of a nonintoxicating beverage, which shall be nutritious and palatable, food products other than grains, of which there is now an adequate supply, but of which the use for such purposes is prohibited by the aforesaid proclamation of September 16, 1918, are required:

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby amend the aforesaid proclamation of September 16, 1918, by inserting in the first sentence of the prohibiting paragraph, after the words "production of," the word "intoxicating" and by striking out of the same sentence the words "including near beer"; and by inserting in the succeeding sentence in both places where the phrase "production of malt liquors" occurs, after the words "production of," the word "intoxicating," and striking out the phrases "including near beer" and "whether or not such malt liquors contain alcohol" in both places in that sentence where these phrases occur, so that as amended the prohibitory provisions of said proclamation shall read as follows:

"That the use of sugar, glucose, corn, rice, or any other foods, fruits, food materials, and feeds in the production of intoxicating malt liquors for beverage purposes be prohibited. And by this proclamation I prescribe and give public notice that on and after October 1, 1918, no person shall use any sugar, glucose, corn, rice, or any other foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds, except hops and malt now already made, in the production of intoxicating malt liquors, for beverage purposes, and on and after December 1, 1918, no person shall use any sugar, glucose, corn, rice, or any other foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds, including malt, in the production of intoxicating malt liquors, for beverage purposes, whether or not such malt liquors contain alcohol."

And the aforesaid proclamation of September 16, 1918, as thus amended, shall remain in full force and effect.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done this 4th day of March, A. D. 1919, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and forty-third.

[SEAL.] WOODROW WILSON.

By the President:

FRANK L. POLK,
Acting Secretary of State.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long upon this matter, but I regard it as one of great importance. I know this is a matter of considerable interest in the State from which I come, with nearly 8,000,000 people and the second city in the Nation. I came into the Senate of the United States when the wave of prohibition was at its very peak. I recall the great debate between the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] upon the one side and the distinguished Senator from Missouri, Mr. Reed, upon the other side. The subject of that debate was the now famous, and I may say I believe almost notorious, five and ten law. In the wave of enthusiasm, and almost of fanaticism, a law was enacted against the protests, against arguments, unavailing and falling upon deaf ears, which I believe was the turning point in the program for prohibition in this land of ours. It was the old, old story of extremists being allowed to go on and on, and finally working their own undoing. The end was clear from the day the law was passed through this Congress making it possible—I say possible—for a judge of the United States to send a youth, be it a boy or a girl, who was found in the act of walking across the street, perhaps to a dance, with a small flask of homemade wine or homemade beer or homemade gin in his or her pocket to the penitentiary for five years and to be fined $10,000. If perchance five different distinct offenses of that terrible and heinous nature were fastened upon that boy or girl, immature, young, perhaps yet in the high school, he or she could be sent to the penitentiary for 25 years and fined $50.000.

Yes, it was said, but that would not be done; that was only for extreme cases. But I say to you if some of the sincerest Members of the Congress, honest in their judgment that this law is the greatest law of all laws and that the only way to enforce it is by imposing the maximum penalty, should reach the Federal bench of this country, honest and sincere and conscientious, seeing the failure of the law to function, believing that as a last resort they should impose a maximum penalty, it might well happen that a boy or girl would be sent to the penitentiary for 25 years for that minor, trivial offense. But the people rose up and rebelled, and within a year amendments to the Jones Five and Ten Act, which were spurned when first presented in the Senate, were unanimously passed here and almost unanimously passed in the other branch of Congress.

But Congress did not go far enough to satisfy some of the five-and-ten law supporters, so Congress went farther and passed the most inhumane and, I think, the most terrible law that has ever been passed by a Congress of the United States. Knowing that some of this liquor was illegally reaching the beverage consumer, this great humane Government of ours provided for the placing in that liquor of deadly poisons to kill, to paralyze, to blind the one who was such a horrible offender as illegally to take a drink of industrial alcohol. We remember, too, the fight that was waged here day after day by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If he did nothing in all his senatorial career but that, he should go down as a great Senator worthy to be remembered by his State and by his Nation. He pictured here to us the evils which this country was putting upon its people by providing that they might be paralyzed by the poison placed in the industrial alcohol by their Government.

Finally this Government, which had decided it was impossible to find any other way of making industrial alcohol so repulsive that it would not be used for beverage purposes, after months and months of protest here did find a way, and now, thanks to the Senator from Maryland more than to anyone else, our Government is not in the business of deliberately and willfully poisoning, paralyzing, and blinding and killing its own people. Knowing that among the millions of veterans of our land, that great mass of patriotic citizens, there would be some who would violate this law, Congress, in one breath provided for their poisoning and in the next breath provided great appropriations to try to restore them to health in the hospitals of the United States Government after the Government itself had poisoned and blinded and paralyzed them. Was there ever a more horrible, absurd, inhumane action taken by any Government?

It is things like this that brought about within the last 30 days or so a most remarkable spectacle in a city from which I come. In the great convention hall there assembled from all over the Nation first the delegates and followers of the Republican Party and then the delegates and followers of the Democratic Party. Among all those who 3 or 5 or 10 or 12 years ago would have been there singing songs and hymns, making all sorts of demonstrations in favor of prohibition, spurred on by zeal and enthusiasm to the painting of pictures of the great good that had come when prohibition came upon our land, not a single voice so far as I know, or so far as I heard, was raised to defend the result of the reign of terror under which the United States has been existing for the last 12 years.

Some raised their voices there upon the ground of politics, saying that it would be a politically unwise thing to modify the Volstead Act or to repeal the eighteenth amendment; but so far as I know no one existed in either one of those conventions reckless enough to say "We prophesied the favorable results 12 years ago that this amendment would bring, and we are here now to defend our position and to say that the results justified our action," not one Democrat and not one Republican.

Almost within a stone's throw of that great convention hall in that great city, second in our land, metropolis of the whole Mississippi Valley, the leaders of America met, and almost within the sound of the voices of the speakers in that great convention hall 200 men have met violent death as the result of this prohibition law which was to bring back law and order to our land. One gangster after another in that very vicinity had met his tragic, horrible death. Up and down those streets, which were then traversed by the delegates on their way to and from the convention, but a few months ago raced and cruised armored cars of beer runners, liquor runners, and gangsters of all kinds. Seven men were shot to their death at one time in a garage by beer runners in the horrible, terrible St. Valentine's Day massacre in the city of Chicago—the fruits of this law which some are determined to keep upon the statute books by every parliamentary trick known to the most experienced and able and ingenious Members of the Senate.

There was no difference between the conventions upon this question. It is said that the Democratic platform is clear. It is clear. It is positive. It is certain. It is understood by everybody except the Democratic Members of Congress. It means repeal, and in the meantime it means immediate modification of the Volstead Act. Everybody knows what it means, as has been well said here time after time—that is, everybody except the leading Members of the Democratic Party—some of them—who have here refused and declined to abide by it.

This is a nonpartisan movement. It is a movement which should be above political and partisan lines. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] said he is a little shocked because anybody would think about politics on the floor of the United States Senate. I think it is a good thing. I think it is right and proper that a candidate for public office should submit his record to voters, that a candidate for reelection to the United States Senate should not evade and should not straddle, but should say to the people of his State, be it Nebraska or be it Illinois or be it Connecitcut, "Here is where I stand and this is what I stand for." Is that wrong? Is that injurious to the public mind? I think not. I think the public have a right to know.

The Democratic platform says:

> We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when intrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe. We hereby declare this to be the platform of the Democratic Party.

Then the platform proceeds with this plain plank, so clear and so easily understood, and says:

> In conclusion, to accomplish these purposes and to recover economic liberty, we pledge the nominees of this convention the best efforts of a great party, whose founder announced the doctrine which guides us now in the hour of our country's need: Equal rights to all; special privileges to none.

A few of us over here are now tendering to Senators on the other side of the Chamber an opportunity to carry out this contract, this covenant with the people, to do what their great party said it would do. I am not endeavoring to make a political partisan speech. I think it is as much the duty of our party over here as it is of the party over on the other side of the Chamber to recognize the situation that has grown up so rapidly that no one dares now oppose it, especially on the floor of this body. But what is the excuse now? One after another, Senators rise, after exhausting all efforts to avoid a vote and to avoid meeting the issue, and say, "We do not know now what constitutes an intoxicating beverage." They knew 12 years ago enough about what constituted an intoxicating beverage to fix the alcoholic content at a percentage which they say now is wrong; but they do not now know enough about it and so they want the testimony of experts. But, Mr. President, you know and I know and all of us know, who practice law and are familiar with lawsuits, that when experts for the drys and experts for the wets are called in their number will be limited only by the means available to employ them; there will be as many on one side as on the other, and some will testify to this and others will testify to that. There will happen what happens in criminal trials where lunacy experts are employed. The court has to limit their number, because as many can be obtained to swear that a man is insane as can be obtained to swear that he is sane, limited only by the amount of money available. So in this case there will be no limit. Experts will appear for the drys and experts for the wets—and many an expert wet can be changed overnight into an expert dry, and vice versa—and we will not know any more about it, in fact, we will know less about it, than we now know.

There is only one way of finding out what the Constitution means, and it will not be through a professor here or professor there or a wet doctor here or a dry doctor there, because there will be scores of them available to each side. We have to abide by our own judgment, the best judgment we have, and submit the question to the courts, to the only place on earth where finally an authoritative definition can be made, and that is the Supreme Court of the United States. We can do that now as well as we can in December or January or February or a year from now. Let us do what we think is right, what our judgment leads us to believe is proper, and now fix the definition. We can not make one much farther from the truth than the one that is now in the law as it now stands. Everybody—or almost everybody—knows that that is a false definition; that seems to be generally conceded.

We can pass the law now. It will mean $200,000,000 of revenue to the National Treasury before next December. We can do more than that. We can convince the people of the United States——

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. On what authority does the Senator think the President will sign such a bill if we should pass it?

Mr. GLENN. Our friends on the other side of the aisle have for a long while been criticizing the President for not saying how he felt upon this subject. This is the answer to their problem. Let us pass a bill—that is our duty—and send it to him. We will then find out how the President feels on this subject. That is the answer to the Senator's problem.

Mr. BULKLEY. First, let me say that I approve of that course fully and I expect to vote that way; but I am asking the Senator whether this is not all merely a sham battle; and whether it is not perfectly certain, in the light of the authoritative statement made by Mr. Garfield the other day, that the President is going to veto anything of this sort that we might pass?

Mr. GLENN. There is but one way of which I know to find out about that, and that is to pass a bill fixing a definition which we think is the correct one, and then allow the President to pass upon it. We will know in that event definitely, and that is the only way by which we can ascertain. Certainly I have no authority to speak for the President. Let us have courage enough to act on the question now. Talk about "passing the buck" in politics and all that sort of thing, let us forget all that; let us do what we think is right on this question, and let us not waste six months or a year or two years or three years or four years. The time has passed when an effort should be made to bring about delay.

When some of us came here a man who advocated a change in the eighteenth amendment or a change in the Volstead Act was linked up with hoodlums, with law violators, with people of a low order. That time has passed. Now a man or a woman who stands advocating a change in the Volstead law may be wrong, but he or she stands with some of the best people in these United States, with men and women many of whom a few years ago were the leaders in the movement for prohibition, for the eighteenth amendment, for the Volstead Act and for all the other acts to which I have referred. This is a great, growing, sweeping movement to which there can be but one ultimate answer. The only question is, Shall we do it now or shall we wait until we return to our homes, to our people, and find out how materially and how drastically this change in sentiment has come about in every great city in the land, in the smallest precinct and in the smallest rural district as well, and then return here with the orders, the commands, the demands of the people and make this change?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DALE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], but I am informed that he would vote as I intend to vote on this question. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], who would vote as I intend to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DICKINSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who is absent from the Chamber. I transfer that pair to my colleague the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], who is absent on necessary business, and will vote. I vote "yea." I wish to add that my colleague, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I understand that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore, I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. MCNARY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Transferring my general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KING. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] to the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BULKLEY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who, if present, would vote "yea." I find that I can transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW]. I make that transfer and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BLACK. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Alabama Mr. [BANKHEAD] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. If present, the Senator from West Virginia would vote "yea."

Mr. BRATTON. I wish the RECORD to show that my colleague [Mr. CUTTING] is absent on account of illness. As stated, he has a pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to say that if the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is necessarily detained from the Senate by a death in his family.

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—50

Ashurst	Black	Byrnes	Cohen
Austin	Borah	Capper	Connally
Bailey	Bratton	Caraway	Costigan

So the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I desire to call up the motion of the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] to reconsider the vote by which the Senate adopted the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, for several days now we have been off the consideration of the home loan bank bill. We have discussed inflation, and beer, and agriculture, and debts, and have gotten away entirely from the principle involved in the home loan bank bill.

The original intention of the proponents of this bill was to set up a system of 12 home-loan banks financed primarily by the Federal Government. After several days' discussion, when the bill was first brought up, the Senate voted, 34 to 32, to take a substitute proposal to set up a home-loan divisions in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the purpose of specializing and immediately taking care of the small-home owner whose mortgage is about to be foreclosed or is in default.

As I stated, the Senate at one time agreed that in order to get immediate relief for the small-home owner we should set up a division in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to specialize in furnishing that relief.

I am quite certain that since this discussion took place the minds of Senators have been taken off the question of home-loan banks to the consideration of other matters, and I plead with the Senate not to reverse its previous position and vote to take out what it has already put in—a temporary provision for taking care of the small-home owner.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. DILL. Can the Senator tell us why the savings and loan banks and the savings banks generally are opposed to his amendment?

Mr. COUZENS. I do not know why they are opposed to it.

Mr. DILL. I observe that the Senator covers them in this amendment. I have just read the amendment. I notice that they are provided for in the amendment, and I am wondering why they are opposing his amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. The reason why they are opposing the amendment, I think, is because they have become committed to the permanent home-loan bank system. The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], during the debate, pointed out that for years back he had introduced bills providing for a system of home-loan banks; and the building and loan associations and others, in their conventions, have gone on record as favoring a system of home-loan banks.

Mr. DILL. It seemed to me when the Senator presented his amendment the other day—and it seems to me more than ever, since I have just reread it—that they would be more adequately cared for under the Senator's amendment which we have adopted than they would under a new set of banks, to be set up as provided by the original bill.

Mr. COUZENS. I have not any doubt in my mind that they are confused. For another thing, I think they know little about the substitute which I have proposed and which the Senate at one time adopted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is that the same reason why the building and loan associations themselves are opposing the Senator's amendment—because it is not a permanent system?

Mr. COUZENS. That is true. They have gone on record in conventions for a number of years as favoring a system of home-loan banks.

Everyone knows that there is no source of income for any of us except those who labor in the mines, in the fields, or in the factories. There is not one of us who could draw his salary or income except from the men and the women who work in the factories, the mines, and the fields. I contend that every time we set up one of the parasitical organizations—organizations that have to live off production, that have no source of income except from the factory worker, the field worker, and the mine worker—we are adding to the burdens of that group of citizens. I venture to say that there is not a Member of Congress who during the last six months has not received hundreds of letters condemning vigorously bureaucracy in Washington, the setting up of more commissions, the setting up of more bureaus; yet under this bill we are setting up an agency that will for a long time have to be supported out of taxation, and no one can venture the prediction that this home-loan bank system will succeed.

As I have said before, not one dollar of stock subscription is promised from any private agency for the stock of these banks. Not a witness who appeared before the committee that held hearings, of which I was a member, promised to subscribe one dollar of stock; and those who are pleading for this home-loan bank system have not committed themselves to a dollar of investment in the bank system. Yet we are asked to have the Federal Government advance $125,000,000, in reality a paltry amount if it is to cover the relief that is sought for the small-home owner.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] says that that is priming the pump. I assert that it will not even prime the pump, because capital at this time is timid. I venture to say that there will be no subscriptions in any substantial amount to the capital stock of the home-loan bank system by the association that are the beneficiaries under this act. What will happen? There is no limitation as to what percentage the Federal Government will put in as their stock subscription. I tried to secure the adoption of an amendment, when the bill was before us heretofore, providing that the private interests should supply at least 50 per cent of the capital. That was protested by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and yet they are perfectly willing to have the Government put up all the capital. There would be some advantage, at least, if those who are urging the creation of these banks would risk their own money to the extent of 50 per cent of the capital required for each bank.

It is true that by an amendment which was adopted by the Senate the banks are now limited to four; and, as a result of that, an amendment was offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] increasing the capital stock of each bank to $15,000,000 in lieu of $5,000,000 as previously provided by the bill; so that, in effect, if these four banks are set up, under the amendment now in the bill, the Government may have to subscribe the entire amount. It is also true that if the building and loan associations, the savings banks, and these others who are beneficiaries under the bill want to come in and take advantage of it, they are required to put up a minimum of $1,500 capital, or a maximum of 1 per cent of their entire amount of outstanding mortgages.

So, Mr. President, if during times like these, when the workers in the fields and the factories and the mines are under great pressure and great strain, Congress wants to burden them with another financial agency, we might just as well set up a class of vice presidents and cashiers in this country, because they certainly will be in the majority before long if we go on with a system of this sort.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. A day or two ago, in discussing his amendment, the Senator stated, as I recall, that his amendment was more favorable to the small-home owner than was the original bill. Will the Senator refer to that again? That interests me very much. I think what we do here ought to be in the interest of the small-home owner if possible, and I should like to hear the Senator in reference to that matter.

Mr. COUZENS. What the Senator has in mind, perhaps, is that the substitute which the Senate adopted would secure immediate action with respect to the ultimate gains from either the substitute or the original bill. I do not claim that there is any difference, because the same limitations are placed in both the substitute and the original bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, as I understand, the only benefit that goes to the small-home owner is that he will get virtually immediate action under the Senator's amendment, whereas he would have to wait until the financial institution was set up in order to get relief under the original bill.

Mr. COUZENS. That is unquestionably true.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I notice that in the Senator's substitute he omits the provision which he had adopted as an amendment to the original bill, providing that individuals might be eligible for loans. Under his substitute the only way of proceeding is to go through these building and loan or mortgage companies. The Senator drops the idea regarding individuals that was in the amendment which he offered, and succeeded in having adopted, to the original bill.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true, because I drafted the substitute before the adoption of the amendment which I later suggested to the original bill. There is another practical difficulty in applying the amendment to my substitute rather than to the original bill. In applying it to the original bill, of course, banks were to be set up throughout the country. That is not true with respect to the substitute. In the substitute we are going to rely on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its 39 agencies—not banks, but agencies—set up throughout the country to make recommendations to the Washington office as to the kind of loans it shall make. If, however, the Senator believes that there is any advantage in having that provision attached to my substitute, I should be perfectly willing to do so, although I am frank to say it will not work so well as it would under the amendment to the original bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I was very much pleased when the Senator offered the amendment to the original bill giving that authority and that right. It seems to me it would be a good policy to carry into the substitute. If we do not do that, the individual owner, the man who wants to liquidate a mortgage and take care of his home, will find that the only avenue through which he can do it is some building association or some mortgage company or some bank.

Mr. COUZENS. I agree with that, and if the vote on the substitute is not reconsidered, I will offer the provision which we put into the original bank bill, to which the Senator referred.

Mr. President, I do not want to take up an unreasonable length of time of the Senate, but I hope that in view of the situation the vote on the substitute will not be reconsidered.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the following telegrams urging prompt passage of the pending home loan bank bill. I am receiving many such messages. I sincerely urge, Mr. President, that we may complete our deliberations on this measure right now, defeat the Couzens substitute, pass the bill as sponsored by the Senator from Indiana, send it to conference, and insure early enactment of a helpful relief measure. I send the telegrams to the desk for the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., July 7, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate:

No hope for relief for Kansas building and loan under Reconstruction Finance Corporation enactment. Work for reconsideration and passage of home-loan bank as passed by House. Know you will do your best.

PAUL B. MORRISON,
Executive Secretary Kansas Building and Loan League.

TOPEKA, KANS., July 7, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate:

Associations in Kansas prohibited from participation in Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. We must have home-loan banks if we are to have any relief. Can you not influence some support for the measure?

C. S. ELLIOTT.
C. A. STERLING.

KANSAS CITY, KANS., July 7, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER:

Twelve associations in Wyandotte County earnestly request you use your best efforts to have Senate reconsider home loan bank bill on basis as passed by House. Building and loans in Kansas must have this assistance, as Reconstruction Finance Corporation affords no relief in this State.

WYANDOTTE COUNTY LEAGUE OF BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS,
FRANK S. POWELL, President.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am decidedly in favor of the adoption of the motion for reconsideration. In the first place, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation now has the right to make loans to building and loan associations. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan adds nothing to that right or power. In fact, it rather limits its power, because now there is no limitation on what they may lend to building and loan associations, whereas the amendment of the Senator from Michigan limits the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to $400,000,000.

In the next place, there can be no dispute about the fact that $400,000,000 is nothing in comparison with the needs of the home owners in the United States whose homes at this time are under mortgage, and a far greater sum than $400,000,000 must be had if those homes are to be saved from the hammer of the sheriff. It is my deliberate judgment that the only way in which that can be secured is by setting up the establishment provided in the original amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Another item with reference to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is that I understand from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that no loan has been made to an association for longer than six months, and it could not be for longer than three years. Surely, if this measure means anything, it deals with long-term mortgages, and not six months' mortgages. It strikes me that that would make this fatal, so far as this proposal is concerned.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, backed up by the fact that Mr. Gardiner, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, when he testified before the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House, said that, in his judgment, this measure was absolutely essential, because the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could not lend for a sufficient length of time in order to satisfy the demand. The testimony of Mr. Gardiner was very explicit; and General Dawes, before the same committee, testified that he was decidedly in favor of the passage of the pending bill as written, because he thought it would fill a long-felt want, and that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at the present time, and under existing conditions, was not equal to the solution of this problem.

Of course, I do not impugn the motive of my friend from Michigan, but, in my judgment, he has not been for the pending bill at any time; he has been against it; and the other day, when the Senator from Idaho offered his amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I asked unanimous consent that it be considered at a fixed time on Tuesday, he objected.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course, I objected, because I wanted the measure offered by the Senator from Idaho to be passed at this session, and everyone knows that we are drawing to a close of the session; and if it were not attached to a bill that we were going to pass in some form, we would not get that little inflation that we would get by the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator says that is what motivated him, I believe him, of course; but knowing his opposition to the bill, I thought he objected, because at that time he believed, as I have said, that if the amendment of the Senator from Idaho were attached to the measure, it would kill it inevitably.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I have made no bones about the fact of being opposed to the bill.

Mr. WATSON. No; the Senator has not.

Mr. COUZENS. I am opposed to the permanent setting up of these banks. There is no question about that. I have not tried to equivocate about it. But the Senator will remember that when the Senator from Idaho offered his inflation bill the Senate at that time had adopted my substitute.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly it had.

Mr. COUZENS. So that I was perfectly willing to have it go through as a substitute.

Mr. WATSON. The Senate adopted the Senator's substitute, but the Senator was not willing that there should be a time fixed for consideration of the Borah amendment. That led me to think, of course, that the Senator was doing everything he could to kill the bill. But, of course, if the Senator says that that was not his motive I accept his statement.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I am wondering whether the Senator from Michigan was indulging in levity on the 1st of July, when in the course of a colloquy with the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] the Senator from New York asked, "Whether the Senator from Michigan is opposed to the bill or not, he wants to perfect it and make it just as good as possible," the Senator from Michigan replied to the Senator from New York, "Or just as bad as possible, as the Senator may choose." Was that levity, or what did it mean?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Ohio may interpret it in any way he cares to. I suspect it was in part levity. But I want to make it as bad as I can if it is going to be a permanent system. I do not want this system set up as a permanent system. I believe it would be another burden; I believe it would be another of these parasites, if you please, to be supported by the man who works in the field, the man who works in the factory, the man who works in the mine, because there is no other way to pay this organization except out of their efforts.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Where is the opposition to this bill coming from? Everybody I hear of among the common, ordinary elements down in my State wants the bill passed. As I understand it, the branch office of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation down in my State is a voluntary organization. There is no salary attached to the people who administer it. If we are going to pass this bill, I do not know why there is an effort to tear it to pieces. Why is it so filled with opposition amendments, which have no object except to tear the bill to pieces or to keep it from being workable?

Mr. WATSON. That is my view, I will say to the Senator.

EMERGENCY HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me so that I may make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. I ask unanimous consent that, beginning with the session to-morrow, House bill 9642, to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction with a view to increasing employment, be made a special order.

Mr. WATSON. Is that the relief bill?

Mr. WAGNER. It will amount to that. The bill provides for an appropriation for Federal aid to State highways. I propose to-morrow to offer a substitute for that bill; that is, the relief bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. What is the request of the Senator?

Mr. WAGNER. I am asking that calendar No. 382 be made a special order.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I understand that I do not lose the floor by this interruption. If I do, I decline to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will not lose the floor.

Mr. WAGNER. I have made the request that House bill 9642 be made a special order beginning to-morrow morning at the opening of the session. It is a bill providing for Federal aid to State highways. My object in making it a special order is so that I may to-morrow offer as a substitute for the highway appropriation a complete relief bill for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Has this complete relief bill the Senator speaks of now been printed?

Mr. WAGNER. I am about to follow that with another request that the so-called substitute be printed for the information of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. It is a complete bill?

Mr. WAGNER. Perhaps that was an unfortunate use of terms. It is the best we can get under the circumstances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York asks that the proposed substitute for House bill 9642 be printed and lie on the table. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The Senator from New York further requests that House bill 9642 be made a special order for to-morrow at the opening of the session of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. Reserving the right to object to the request, if the bill mentioned by the Senator from New York is made a special order at the convening of the Senate to-morrow, would that displace some other bill which the Senate might, by action this evening, make the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business would take precedence, and the special order would follow.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would like to ask one further question, so that we may know by to-morrow morning what we are to be thinking about? What change does this make in the bill we voted on?

Mr. WAGNER. It eliminates the feature to which objection has been made, providing for loans to individuals and corporations, loans to private industry.

Mr. BORAH. But it leaves private industry?

Mr. WAGNER. No.

Mr. BORAH. It eliminates private industries and individuals both?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Has the President changed his mind on private industries also?

Mr. WAGNER. I have not changed my mind about it.

Mr. BORAH. I did not mean to indicate that the Senator had. I had understood that the President objected only to loans to individuals.

Mr. WAGNER. That is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

Mr. WATSON. What is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will again state his request.

Mr. WAGNER. I ask unanimous consent that House bill 9642, Calendar No. 382, be made a special order beginning with the opening of the session to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The special order was reduced to writing, as follows:

SPECIAL ORDER

Ordered (by unanimous consent), That the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction with a view to increasing employment be made a special order immediately after convening of the Senate July 12, 1932.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7293) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to the city of Springfield, Mass., permission to construct and maintain a highway bridge across United States military reservation at the Springfield Armory, Mass.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11732) to amend section 2 of an act approved February 25, 1929 (45 Stat. 1303), to complete the acquisition of land adjacent to Bolling Field, D. C., and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. HILL of Alabama, Mr. FITZPATRICK, and Mr. JAMES were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

LANDS ADJACENT TO BOLLING FIELD IN THE DISTRICT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11732) to amend section 2 of an act approved February 25, 1929 (45 Stat. 1303), to complete the acquisition of land adjacent to Bolling Field, D. C., and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. REED, Mr. CUTTING, and Mr. FLETCHER conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOME-LOAN BANKS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have had a long experience with legislation, and have never had so many interruptions of all kinds in trying to make a short talk and never have known of a bill to be so hampered and handicapped and hamstrung in all my experience as has been the home loan bill by every sort of interruption.

I now want to insist that in some form or other we pass this bill before we leave here to-night. Certainly it is worthy of the consideration of the Senate of the United States. I think a majority of the Members of the Senate believe in the bill and want to pass it in some form, but I believe we might just as well not pass it at all as to pass it in the form in which it now is, because we add nothing to the power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by the Couzens amendment. On the contrary, we might even limit the scope of its operations.

Mr. President, I am not going to make a long talk about this matter, because I think we have all made up our minds about how we are going to vote on the question of reconsideration. Therefore I am willing that the vote be taken.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, my attitude toward the motion to reconsider depends upon the attitude of Senators on the other side who emasculated and ruined the pending bill by the adoption of the Walcott amendment.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Why does the Senator say "on the other side," as if it were a partisan proposition? I was opposed to that amendment as much as a man could be. I did not want the amendment adopted.

Mr. COPELAND. I took the pains to go over the RECORD to see, and I found that nine administration Republicans, who ought to be supporting the President in trying to enact into law an acceptable and decent and workable home loan bank bill, voted in favor of the Walcott amendment which, added to the bill, makes it worth nothing, not nearly so much as the amendment suggested by the Senator from Michigan. That is my answer.

Mr. WATSON. That is not an answer, I will say to my good friend from New York. Does the Senator think it was a partisan matter? Did anybody try to rally Senators on the strength of being Republicans or Democrats? The amendment came up and was voted on without any regard to partisanship. Nobody thought of asking such a question as that. I was opposed to it, and I have been accused of being a Republican and an administration man.

Mr. COPELAND. Can the Senator give us any assurance at all that the Walcott amendment will be reconsidered if we reconsider the Couzens amendment?

Mr. WATSON. I will vote to reconsider it and will support the motion vigorously.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator can do a little more than that. He can hustle around and help us.

Mr. WATSON. I shall be very happy, with every ounce of influence I can muster, to bring about its reconsideration, but how can we do it?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, not since I have been in the Senate has there been under consideration a measure so dear to my heart as this one. There is no subject which I have studied more thoroughly since my early manhood than the matter of building and loan associations. When my party was in power it proposed a building and loan association home bank bill. In 1924 I introduced such a bill and again in 1927. It was always desired, and now, I may say to my friend, it is the desire of the building and loan associations to provide long-term mortgages.

If we are going to have no long-term mortgages the proposal of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] of course is preferable, because it provides more money. It provides $400,000,000, but that money is not of any avail to building and loan associations. It is not going to solve the problems of the home owners who are now struggling about what to do with short-term mortgages that are to run one or two or three years and where foreclosure is threatened. What we desire is that there may be long-term mortgages amortized in such a way that they can be paid off by the month.

Mr. President, I say again that the bill was emasculated by the votes of the standpat Republicans. They are responsible for it. The Senator from Indiana, who says that at times he is a Republican—I have never known the time when he was not—assures me that he will do all he can. He can use his influence by speech and by word of mouth and by personal contact to make possible the reconsideration of the Walcott amendment. If that can be done, I would be delighted to have reconsideration of the Couzens amendment and the matter brought back to be reconsidered on its merits.

Let me say to my friends on the Democratic side of the aisle that I know they have some confidence in me even if Senators on the other side have not. The building and loan associations of every State in the Union have been making appeals to Senators through the past several weeks to pass this bill in order that there may be provided a reservoir out of which may be had money to take care of the mortgages which are in default, the short-term mortgages, in order that they may be amortized over long periods and the people taken out of their misery. What did the Walcott amendment do? It said the limit of the lending should be for five years. That is not going to help the building and loan associations. The shortest term they have in their mortgages is eight years. It is not going to help them a bit, not any more than the $125,000,000 provided for, because if it is limited to five years, there will be no money available for the building and loan associations.

I appeal to Senators, each and every one of them, to see what the situation is. The building and loan associations of my section of the country, the cooperative banks of New England, the savings banks everywhere, are making this appeal for money which they are to use to amortize mortgages over a period of 8 or 10 years.

Now, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], charming as he is, and my friend, has offered an amendment which, in my opinion, ruins the bill. It makes it no good. It does not begin to be as good as the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. It is in the interest of the insurance companies of Connecticut and New York, the companies that do a pawnbroker's business in mortgages, one or two year term mortgages; but the little, modest home owner, spoken of by the Senator from Michigan as the man from the mine and the field and the factory, is not going to be served and taken care of by that sort of thing. The short-term mortgages they have run only a year or two, and they have to make application for renewal and pay a bonus and all those extra charges.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is there a motion pending to reconsider the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut? Can the Senator from New York inform me?

Mr. COPELAND. There is such a motion pending on notice given by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] for reconsideration, but the Senator from Idaho can see our dilemma. If we are not to have that motion acted on favorably, so there is hope that we may have what was intended by the authors of the bill, we might better have the proposal of the Senator from Michigan, because it gives us $400,000,000 right away which can be loaned out for six months or a year or even three years. It would give us that much money, but even that would not solve our problem.

I want Senators to see the dilemma in which we find ourselves.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Is it not the real fact of the matter that many of these loan companies have gotten hold of a lot of bad mortgages and they want to have the Government take them up through this proposed system of banks, like the farm-land banks did, and eventually the Government would have to take them in, like the Government took in the farm lands of the country?

Mr. COPELAND. I have protested against the inclusion of insurance companies and similar institutions because many of them did have the kind of mortgages spoken of by the Senator from Washington. This bill is primarily intended to be for the benefit of the building and loan associations.

Mr. DILL. Yes; and it turned out to be a bill to help a lot of companies that have the kind of bad mortgages to which I have referred.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that is true.

Mr. DILL. I do not want to vote for that kind of a bill.

Mr. COPELAND. But if the Senator will help us to do two things we can save the situation. If we can get some moral support so we can believe that the Walcott amendment will be wiped out, then we can——

Mr. DILL. Is not the quickest way of getting this matter settled to let it go to conference? All of the provisions are in the House text and it can be worked out in conference. We can not rewrite the bill on the floor of the Senate. Is it not the sensible thing to send the bill to conference? It seems to me we are going to merely thresh over old straw and not get anywhere by going back and attempting to reconsider all these matters.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not think it is quite right in order to get legislation to have bills rewritten in conference. We have it in our power in the Senate to perfect the bill and if we do it by getting rid of the Walcott amendment I have no doubt that in conference the thing the Senator from Washington has in his mind will be corrected; that is, there will not be included among those who can borrow the institutions who are seeking to get rid of "dead horses." But I feel so keenly on the matter that I would a great deal rather leave it where it is, knowing we are going to have $400,000,000 that will be used. However, if we can have the assurance along with reconsideration of the Couzens amendment that there will be a reconsideration of the Walcott amendment, then we can safely send the bill to conference and probably have brought out a bill that will do for the people of the country what they have long desired to have accomplished—and that is the creation of a central bank like the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York if there is a motion pending to reconsider the Walcott amendment?

Mr. COPELAND. There is a notice on the table given by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. But the thing about which I am worried is that if we bring about reconsideration of the Couzens amendment, then we will come later to have nothing in that line but the emasculated bill spoiled by the Walcott amendment. I would like to be able to use my voice, defective as it is to-day, to urge Senators to a reconsideration of the Couzens amendment, which I urged them to vote for the other day, provided we can have assurance from the other side of the Chamber that the Walcott amendment will be eliminated. That is the position in which I find myself.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is not the Senator pleading for a permanent system of home banks? I am told that there are some associations taking advantage of the depression, which have urged the proposed legislation. There are many persons who favor legislation to afford some relief to persons threatened with the loss of their homes, but who are opposed to fastening upon the country a system of banks which heretofore we have not had.

Mr. COPELAND. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that his party under Mr. Wilson proposed this very system. Why should not the little home owners in the building and loan associations have exactly the same privileges of rediscount that the big banks have to the Federal reserve system? The Senator has not any doubt about the value of the Federal reserve system. Why should not these building and loan associations and cooperative institutions have the same privilege? The Senator need not worry. The Government is not going into this thing forever. The Government is put in to the extent of $125,000,000, and provision is made in the bill that at any time the Congress can bring it to an end.

Mr. KING. In a system of banks established a number of years ago, the Government furnished the capital and at this session we have been called upon to appropriate $125,000,000 to supplement them because of their unsatisfactory condition. Is there any assurance that the Government will not be called upon to make further capital contributions in the future?

Mr. COPELAND. When I think about the 8,000,000 of homes that have been built through these institutions, I would be ungrateful if I did not stand for them, because the first house I ever owned I gained possession of through membership in a building and loan association.

Mr. WATSON. So did I.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Indiana states that he did the same thing, and other Senators have given me similar information. The building and loan associations, however, have always been hampered in the volume of work they could do by reason of the fact that they had only local funds with which to operate. Of course, in the early days the intention was to build houses. It is not planned to do that now; but what we are planning to do is to provide a means for the unfortunate home owner who has given a thousand dollar mortgage for one year, two years, or three years, to some mortgage-loan company or mortgage or other banker, who is now indifferent to conditions which prevail and is demanding the money and saying, "Pay us or we shall foreclose."

If we can pass this bill, and if it operates as its authors believe it will, there will be funds sufficient to take care of those mortgages which are about to be foreclosed and to save many families who are now under the obligation every year or every two years of paying bonuses and the excess charges to save them from disaster and safeguard their homes. I know as well as I know anything that nothing is better for our country than to have every family housed in its own home. That is the way to make good citizens; that is the way to produce happiness and contentment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from New York is well aware that from the beginning this proposal has not been unanimously supported.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. FESS. From the very first suggestion there has been opposition to it. Certain great elements of a financial character have opposed it. It is stated that in order to be workable there ought to be a leeway of something like from 8 to 14 years——

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. FESS. And that anything short of that will render the plan useless.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is right.

Mr. FESS. The reason I did not want the matter turned over to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is that that institution is temporary in character, and, while loan associations may be beneficiaries under the law, there has been no loan made by that corporation beyond six months, and they can not loan for more than three years. That would make the provision which has been adopted rather unworkable. The proposal about which the Senator from New York is talking struck me when it was first suggested as being obnoxious to the whole philosophy of the bill, not only making it a temporary affair but providing a limit of time which would render it wholly workable.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is right.

Mr. FESS. We can kill the bill outright or we can kill it by making the time so short that its advantages will not be availed of.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. I agree that we should cut it from eight to four, although there may be some doubt as to the advisability of doing that.

Mr. COPELAND. That is as to the number of home-loan banks.

Mr. FESS. Yes. I do not think that that is a serious matter, but when it comes to limiting the time it certainly is serious. That is not the theory upon which the measure has been built, and I agree with the Senator that we might as well vote the whole bill down if it is going to be thus amended.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is entirely sound in what he says.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me for just a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from New York says the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio is entirely sound. Is it not a very practical question that is before us, whether we adopt the Couzens amendment or the original bill, the measure will have to go to conference and the conferees will work it out anyway? The two bills will be so entirely different, the conferees can certainly frame a bill that will be satisfactory if the measure we shall pass shall not be satisfactory. The bill has got to go to conference, and it seems to me the sooner we get it to conference the better, so that a satisfactory bill may be worked out.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COPELAND. Suppose the motion to reconsider were to carry and then the motion to reconsider the Walcott amendment should not carry, would it be in order after that to offer in effect the same amendment which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] has offered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the motion to reconsider shall be agreed to there would have to be another vote taken on the Couzens amendment. As the Chair understands the Senator's question, if that motion should be adopted and then a motion were made to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut was adopted, and that failed, this amendment could not be offered in the exact form, but it could be offered in a modified form.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, Mr. President, may I say to those who take the same view that I take, I am willing to test the leadership of the Senator from Indiana, and, so far as I have any influence, I suggest that we vote to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment of the Senator from Michigan was agreed to; and then, as the Vice President has suggested, there will be a motion made as to the Walcott amendment. After that, so far as I am concerned, if the Walcott amendment should stay in, and a limitation of five years be placed upon this bill, knowing something about the building and loan associations I would say that in some modified form the Couzens amendment ought to be put back in the bill because $400,000,000, as provided by the Senator from Michigan, or four hundred and fifty or five hundred millions dollars, which we might put in by having to change somewhat the form of the amendment, would be a great deal better than this plan with the Walcott amendment added to it, because, with the 5-year limit, there would not be any possibility of selling any bonds; it would be impossible to amortize any issue of long-term bonds; it could not be done; and so the only good that we would get out of it would be the four or five hundred million dollars which might be loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Therefore, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned I urge that we reconsider the vote whereby the Couzens amendment was adopted.

I ask that there may be included in the RECORD a memorandum concerning the Couzens substitute, which was prepared on behalf of the United States Building and Loan League by William E. Best, president.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum is as follows:

The United States Building and Loan League urges the approval of the home loan bank bill as perfected by the House and Senate Banking and Currency Committees.

We further urge that the substitute bill, "To provide for the making of loans to certain home-financing institutions by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation," be rejected.

The Couzens substitute is not satisfactory or adequate for the following reasons:

(1) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a temporary expedient making short-time loans only. To date no advance has been made to a building and loan association for a period in excess of six months. Legally no advance can be made in excess of three years. The home-financing institutions, particularly building and loan associations, need long-time money if they are to continue to make 8 to 14 year home mortgages. Money can not be borrowed for six months' time and reloaned to the home owner for from 8 to 14 years. Therefore the funds available from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are not adaptable or satisfactory for their purposes.

(2) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation meets only emergency needs, such as the repayment of bank borrowings, the meeting of maturities, and urgent withdrawal demands. No building and loan association can safely borrow 6-month money to carry on its normal business. The building and loan associations and savings banks, which advance money on long-term mortgages, need a permanent institution created immediately, designed to place at their disposal a source of credit for long-term funds. If home mortgages are to be made for 8 to 14 years, funds used by building associations should be available for similar periods.

(3) At present the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is making advances to home-financing institutions, including building and loan associations, in a number of States. The proposed bill adds no powers which the corporation does not have at the present time but proposes that an aggregate amount of loans (not to exceed $400,000,000) be made to the home-financing institutions under restrictions more rigorous than those imposed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. For example, the bill proposes that no mortgage be accepted if the value of the real estate exceeds $10,000, and it then further provides that no loan in excess of 40 per cent of the value of the real estate be made by the corporation. This means that building and loan associations, savings banks, trust companies, State and national banks could not secure even the short-time funds of the corporation on a considerable portion of their available mortgage securities. If the substitute becomes the latest expression of Congress on the matter, its interpretation might result in a curtailment rather than an expansion of the present activities of the corporation, which would render impossible renewals of many of its present 6-months' advances to financial institutions made upon collateral that would be ineligible by the suggested substitute. Note that the substitute, as drawn, applies to national banks, State banks, insurance companies, and "other banking organizations."

(4) The service being rendered and possible to be rendered to the institutions mentioned in the home loan bank bill by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was fully gone into by the House committee, which summoned before it General Dawes, president of the corporation, and Mr. Gardner, in charge of the building and loan division of the corporation.

General Dawes, in answer to direct question of Mr. CAMPBELL, a member of the committee, testified as follows:

"Mr. CAMPBELL. You would recommend the enactment of this home loan bank bill?

"General DAWES. I would, absolutely; yes.

"Mr. CAMPBELL. You give it your unqualified indorsement?

"General DAWES. My unqualified indorsement. Yes" (p. 418, House hearings).

Mr. Gardner testified (p. 420 of the House hearings), in answer to question of Chairman REILLY, as follows:

"Mr. REILLY. Then the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is not the proper set-up, as regards the length of time for loans that can be made, to accomodate and meet the demands and requirements of the building and loan association?

"Mr. GARDNER. Absolutely not. My thought is this: In the event of the passage of the home loan bank bill, loans which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has made to the building and loan associations should be picked up by the home loan bank system, refinanced and reorganized on a long-term basis, suitable to the needs of these associations."

Again, on page 422, Mr. Williams, a member of the committee, asked General Dawes the following questions:

"Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the relative position of the applications of building and loan associations, as compared to banks, and railroads, insurance companies, and other agencies under this act?

"General DAWES. So far, building and loan applications are very much smaller.

"Mr. CAMPBELL. Would that be due to the reason that Mr. Gardner mentioned, that they do not care to accept 6-months' paper?

"General DAWES. Exactly."

(5) The Couzens substitute forces a continuation of the unsatisfactory situation in which the home-financing institutions are now having to seek their relief from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, whose agencies are officered entirely by men from the commercial banking field, many of whom are uninformed and even unsympathetic with the peculiar problems and needs of the small community home-financing institutions. The formalities of obtaining funds from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have been found to be so burdensome that building and loan associations have spent several months in numerous cases in obtaining even much-needed short-term funds and, in general, can only go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under pressure of called bank loans or other extreme distress.

(6) Those who have studied the home-loan bank legislation (including committees of both Houses) feel that it will make long-term funds available to the community banking and home-financing institutions, as well as release savings to the wage earners, the class of citizen that patronizes particularly the building and loan associations and savings banks.

(7) There are a number of States in which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for legal reasons has not been able to make any advances to building and loan associations. This has affected particularly Florida, Oklahoma, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, and there are several other States in which the matter has not yet been determined.

(8) Senator COUZENS, in presenting the substitute, indicated that there was a question of fundamental policy involved, namely, whether additional bureaus and banking organizations should be created or whether existing governmental agencies should be employed. If the Reconstruction Finance Corporation were to properly take care of this situation, it would have to establish a bureau staff equal to the organization required for the home-loan bank system.

(9) With the problems of the institutions with which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation deals, the capacities of the corporation are sorely taxed and additional functions should not be added to it, if regard is given to the public interest in serving the railroads, banks, closed banks, stock loans, crop credits, and all the financial institutions.

The experiences of the past two years emphatically indicate that some rearrangements are necessary in our banking structure. It is sound public banking policy to detach certain forms of investment banking—in this case, long-term credits on urban residential real estate—from the commercial banking structure, where the policy is necessarily that of marketability and liquidity. In this case, the Government is merely providing the vehicle through which over 11,000 building and loan associations, distributed over the whole United States, and the savings banks and other home-financing institutions may, at their own expense and under their own responsibility, as far as the 8 to 12 banks are concerned, and under the rigorous guidance and supervision of the Federal board, provide the rediscounting facilities that these institutions need in conducting their normal business. Hundreds of bank failures could have been avoided if they had not coupled real-estate mortgage lending with their normal and proper business. Similarly, hundreds of building and loan associations and like institutions would be in funds and functioning normally to-day if this reserve system for the home-financing institutions had been established earlier.

In conclusion, we urge the passage of the home loan bank bill, as perfected by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, and insist that the proposed substitute is only a temporary makeshift and does not increase in any way the power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, nor does it adequately serve the existing situation.

A billion dollars is needed. The home loan bank bill merely permits the borrowing of $125,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds and provides the vehicle through which the necessary assistance can be distributed, both immediately and permanently, and through which funds can be raised without burdening the Treasury. Provision is made for the retirement of the Government's advance as rapidly as eligible institutions join and take advantage of the home-loan bank system.

Congress has provided a reserve credit system for the commercial and financial interests, as well as for the agricultural interests, and the home owners are only asking through the building and loan associations that they be given similar consideration. From the point of view of the present situation, the home-owning class, constituting, as it does, the very foundation of a stable and loyal citizenry, is entitled to receive such consideration. The building and loan associations are institutions of the common people, and the home owner can best be served by providing a permanent reserve institution for their immediate use.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senate should recess now, the home loan bank bill would be the unfinished business to-morrow, would it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would be.

Mr. WATSON. And it would take precedence over a special order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would.

Mr. WATSON. And it would take a two-thirds vote to supplant the unfinished business by the special order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; a majority vote could do it.

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COPELAND. I understand that my colleague [Mr. WAGNER] asked unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside to-morrow——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is mistaken. The junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] asked unanimous consent that the bill be made a special order, which would follow the unfinished business then pending.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on July 8, 1932, the President approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

S. 3154. An act authorizing the conveyance of certain lands to the city of Fallon, Nev.; and

S. J. Res. 148. Joint resolution to permit a compact or agreement between the States of Idaho and Wyoming respecting the disposition and apportionment of the waters of the Snake River and its tributaries, and for other purposes.

DIRECTORS OF THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION (S. DOC. NO. 136)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Section 3 of the act creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation provides:

> The management of the corporation shall be vested in a board of directors consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, or in his absence, the Under Secretary of the Treasury, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and the Farm Loan Commissioner, who shall be members ex officio, and four other persons appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Of the seven members of the board of directors not more than four shall be members of any one political party and not more than one shall be appointed from any one Federal reserve district.

The extraordinary heavy burdens placed upon the directors of the corporation during the past few months have resulted in the overwork especially of the ex officio members. It has within the past few days arrived at a point where there is danger of a physical breakdown among the ex officio members in their endeavor to carry dual duties.

I therefore recommend to the Congress an amendment to the act which would eliminate the governor of the Federal Reserve Board and the Farm Loan Commissioner as members ex officio when successors shall have been appointed. It is important that the Secretary of the Treasury shall remain as an ex officio member, and under the provisions for the Under Secretary to act as an alternate it offers the necessary relief. It is desirable that the Treasury should maintain its intimate association with the corporation because of the great financial problems involved in Government issues.

In order that the operations of the corporation may be conducted with certainty and public confidence, both as to its nonpartisan character and its personnel, I recommend that the number of the board be increased to eight, of whom not more than four shall belong to any one political party.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 11, 1932.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States transmitting the nomination of a secretary in the Diplomatic Service, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

USE OF COTTON TWINE BY POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed by me to-day to J. R. McCarl, Comptroller General of the United States.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
JULY 11, 1932.

Hon. J. R. MCCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

MY DEAR GENERAL MCCARL: The appropriation bill for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year 1933 carries the following language:

"SEC. 5. In the expenditure of appropriations in this act or appropriations hereafter made, the Secretary of the Treasury in the case of the Treasury Department, and the Postmaster General in the case of the Post Office Department, shall, unless in his discretion the interest of the Government will not permit, purchase, or contract for, within the limits of the United States, only articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that such articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States may cost more, if such excess of cost be not unreasonable. In giving effect to this section special consideration shall be given to the domestic article where the raw material of which the article is made is grown in the United States and the article is manufactured in the United States."

This provision of law was worked out with a view to requiring the various Government departments to use products of the United States rather than foreign products, "notwithstanding that such articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States may cost more, if such excess of cost be not unreasonable," and so forth.

In this connection I desire to call to your attention that the purchasing office of the Post Office Department has recently negotiated a tentative contract with Ludlow Sales Corporation of Boston for the purchase of 1,600,000 pounds of jute twine at a stated cost of $142,400. The purchasing office has advised me, in reply to my inquiries, that cotton twine of practically the same yardage per pound was offered to the department at a cost of about $2,000 more than the award for jute twine.

The bid for jute twine was 8.9 cents per pound with a yardage of 814 to the pound. The cotton bid was 9 cents per pound for cotton twine with a yardage of 800 to the pound. Cotton twine with 840 yards to the pound was offered at 0.915.

Since you, under the law, are vested with the power of determining the availability of Government funds in payment of charges incurred by various departments of the Government, I desire to submit this matter to you and ask for a ruling as to the power of the Post Office Department to ignore the provisions of the law above quoted, and to grossly abuse whatever discretion such act grants to the department.

The only discretion granted to the Postmaster General is determination of the question as to whether "the interest of the Government will not permit * * *." That is the only grant of discretionary power. The other clauses of the act require the purchase of articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, with the further provision that the Postmaster General shall, in giving effect to this section, give special consideration to the domestic article where the raw material of which the article is made is grown in the United States and the article is manufactured in the United States.

It may be urged that jute twine, if manufactured in the United States, would come within the terms set forth in the act. Even though that may be true, the concluding sentence in section 5 clearly indicates that it was the intent of Congress that preference should be given to articles which were both grown and manufactured in the United States. Since the cotton twine is not only manufactured in the United States but the raw material of which it is made is also of the growth of the United States, it is clear that Congress intended it should have a preference over jute or any other article which, though manufactured in the United States, is not made of material grown in the United States.

One of the high functions of your office is to protect the Treasury against expenditures not authorized or not warranted by Congress. I desire to submit to you the above facts and to urge that you withhold payment of the $142,400 to the Ludlow Sales Corporation, of Boston, on the ground that, under the facts set forth, the Post Office Department had no authority to award to such company a purchase of jute twine when cotton twine of superior quality could be purchased for not exceeding $2,000 more. I submit that such increased cost of $2,000 is not unreasonable in view of the provisions of law quoted above.

Thanking you for your attention to this matter, I am,
Sincerely,

TOM CONNALLY.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 12, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate July 11, 1932

SECRETARY IN THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE

William W. Butterworth, jr., of Louisiana, now a Foreign Service officer, unclassified, and a vice consul of career, to be also a secretary in the Diplomatic Service of the United States of America.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JULY 11, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Vernon Norwood Ridgely, of the Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, father of all mankind, we recognize our dependence upon Thee. In Thee we live, move, and have our being. We are grateful to Thee for the privilege and joy of living and for all the blessings which we have received from Thy bountiful hands. We acknowledge our weakness and the desires of our carnal nature. We have made mistakes, perhaps we have yielded to temptation; it may be we have openly sinned. We confess our mistakes and our manifold sins and earnestly pray that Thou wouldst forgive us, that Thou wouldst cleanse our hearts by the inspiration of Thy Holy Spirit that we may perfectly love Thee and worthily magnify Thy holy name. Guide us in all our ways by Thy spirit. Keep us from making mistakes when forming judgments and making decisions. Continue to be gracious unto us as a nation. Let Thy favor be upon us day by day. Make us a blessing to all the world. We earnestly pray Thy protection for our homes. Guard all of our interests and help us day by day to serve Thee in the interest of humanity. We ask it in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, July 8, 1932, was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify absent Members, and the Clerk called the roll. The following Members failed to answer to their names:

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12445) entitled "An act to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such program."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 7293, an act requesting the Secretary of War to grant to the city of Springfield, Mass., permission to construct and maintain a highway and bridge across United States military reservation at the Springfield Armory, Mass.; and

H. R. 11732, an act to amend section 2 of an act approved February 25, 1929 (45 Stat. 1303), to complete the acquisition of land adjacent to Bolling Field, D. C., and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 7939. An act to authorize the presentation of a distinguished-flying cross to Russell N. Boardman and John L. Polando, and Wiley Post and Harold Gatty, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10246. An act to fix the fees to be charged for the issue of domestic money orders;

H. R. 10494. An act to provide a postage charge on notices to publishers regarding undeliverable second-class matter; and

H. R. 12445. An act to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by providing for and expediting a public-works program.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COLLINS presented a conference report on the bill H. R. 7897 making appropriations for military and nonmilitary activities for the War Department for the year ending June 30, 1933, for printing under the rule.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I received the following telegram from Kansas City, Kans.:

> Please send me immediately 100 copies of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the Strong-Lambertson debate on Friday.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have looked in vain through the RECORD of both Friday and Saturday and find to my astonishment that neither of the two speeches made by the distinguished statesmen from Kansas appear so far in the RECORD.

For the benefit of those Members who were not present late Friday afternoon, I may state that these two literary gems referred to were speeches by the Hon. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON and the Hon. JAMES G. STRONG. The House was treated to a great debate, and a valuable discussion centering chiefly around the art of injecting paraffin under a bull's hide [laughter], thereby adding to the appearance, personality, and vitality of the aforesaid bull when he was exhibited at a Kansas State fair.

Immediately after the debate was concluded, the able and astute Republican whip, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BACHMANN] rushed over to his brethren from Kansas, and held close communion with them for a long time, and therefore it is fair to assume that the nonappearance of the speeches so far in the RECORD is due to Mr. BACHMANN. The two Members from Kansas are now present. I appeal to them for the entertainment and enlightenment of the House, for the benefit of their Kansas constituents, and for the general edification of the country at large, to insert those speeches in the RECORD to-day, without attempting to delete any portion of them. [Applause.]

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire when we are to take up the conference report upon the Army appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. That conference report was sent up to the desk a short time ago to be printed under the rule.

Mr. SNELL. I understood that they were going to ask unanimous consent that it was going to be taken up to-day.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, the Senate acts upon this bill first, and we will act upon it as soon thereafter as we can.

SPRINGFIELD ARMORY, MASS.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7293) requesting the Secretary of War to grant to the city of Springfield, Mass., permission to construct and maintain a highway and bridge across the United States military reservation at Springfield Armory, Mass., with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to the city of Springfield, Mass., permission to construct and maintain a highway bridge across the United States military reservation at the Springfield Armory, Mass."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

So the Senate amendment was concurred in.

ACQUISITION OF LAND ADJACENT TO BOLLING FIELD

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 11732) to amend section 2 of an act approved February 25, 1929, to complete the acquisition of land adjacent to Bolling Field, D. C., and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11732, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. HILL of Alabama, Mr. FITZPATRICK, and Mr. JAMES.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks the attention of the House for a moment. Where a House bill has been passed, has gone to the Senate, and the Senate has amended it, the Chair thinks it is the duty of the Chair to recognize the Member in charge of the bill to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration either to go to conference or concur in the Senate amendment. If any of the gentlemen have bills under such circumstances, the Chair will recognize them for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for the consideration of the Senate amendment at this time.

DISTRICT BUSINESS—BOARD OF INDETERMINATE SENTENCE AND PAROLE

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 10273, to establish a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the District of Columbia, and to determine its functions, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent to consider in its place Senate bill 1155 of similar title and text.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, let the bill be reported.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established in the District of Columbia a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the penal institutions for said District, to consist of three members, residents of said District, to be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, none of which members shall be officially connected with the prison administration in any other capacity; that of the three members first appointed after the passage of this act, one shall be appointed for three years, one for five years, and one for seven years; thereafter all appointments, except such as may be made for the remainder of unexpired terms, shall be for the term of seven years. It shall be the duty of the Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole to examine into the physical, mental, and moral records of the prisoners committed to the penal institutions of the District; receive reports of wardens and other officials, including the psychiatrist; recommend the treatment which, in their opinion, is most conducive to the prisoners' reformation; and provide for a system of determining the proper time of release and the rehabilitation of the ex-prisoner in the community. The board shall adopt rules and regulations for its procedure, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The members of the board shall serve without compensation: Provided, That actual and necessary traveling expenses of the members of the board, incurred in the performance of duties under this act, shall be allowed and paid as herein provided.

SEC. 2. The Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole shall, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, appoint parole officers, in such number as shall be approved by Congress from time to time, for the penal institutions of said District, one of whom shall also act as the clerk of said Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole. It shall be the duty of such officers, subject to the discretion and control of said board, to perform such duties and exercise such authority as the said board may direct. Salaries and the actual and necessary traveling expenses of each such parole officer shall be paid out of the appropriation for the maintenance of the penal institution to which he is assigned and receive compensation in accordance with the rates established by the personnel classification act of 1923. (All other necessary expenses incurred in the administration of this act shall be paid out of the appropriations for the penal institutions from which prisoners are paroled, and such appropriations are hereby made available therefor.)

SEC. 3. That hereafter, in imposing sentence on a person convicted in the District of Columbia of a felony, the justice or judge of the court imposing such sentence shall sentence the person for a maximum period, not exceeding the maximum fixed by law, and for a minimum period not exceeding one-fifth of the maximum period fixed by law, and any person so convicted and sentenced may be released on parole as herein provided at any time after having served the minimum sentence: Provided, however, That this act shall not abrogate the power of the justice or judge to sentence a convicted prisoner to the death penalty as now or hereafter may be provided by law: Provided further, That where a justice or a judge of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has imposed a life sentence on the prisoner convicted in the District of Columbia, said prisoner serving such sentence shall be eligible to parole as herein provided at any time after having served 15 years of his life's sentence.

SEC. 4. That whenever, within the limitations of section 3 of this act, it shall appear to the Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole, from the reports of the prisoner's work and conduct which may be received in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed, and from the study and examination made by the board itself, that any prisoner serving an indeterminate sentence is fitted by his training for release, that there is a reasonable probability that such a prisoner will live and remain at liberty without violating the law, and in the opinion of the board such release is not incompatible with the welfare of society, said Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole may, in its discretion, authorize the release of such prisoner on parole, and he shall be allowed to go on parole, outside of said prison, and in the discretion of the board to return to his home upon such terms and conditions, including personal reports from said paroled prisoner, as said Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole shall prescribe, and to remain, while on parole, in the legal custody and under the control of the superintendent of the institution from which the prisoner may have been paroled, until the expiration of the maximum of the term or terms specified in his sentence, less such good-time allowance as is, or may hereinafter be, provided by law; and the said board shall in every parole fix the limits of the residence of such person paroled, which limits, however, may be thereafter changed in the discretion of the board.

SEC. 5. If said Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole, or any member thereof, shall have reliable information that a prisoner has violated his parole, said board, or any member thereof, at any time within the term or terms of the prisoner's sentence, may issue a warrant to any officer hereinafter authorized to execute the same for the retaking of such prisoner. Any officer of the penal institution from which such prisoner shall have been paroled or any Federal officer authorized to serve criminal process within the United States to whom such warrant shall be delivered is authorized and required to execute such warrant by taking such prisoner and returning him to said penal institution.

SEC. 6. At the next meeting of the Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole held after the issuing of a warrant for the retaking of any paroled prisoner, said board shall be notified thereof, and if such prisoner shall have been returned to the institution, he shall be given an opportunity to appear before said Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole, and the said board may then, or at any time in its discretion, revoke the order and terminate such parole or modify the terms and conditions thereof and if such order of parole be revoked and the parole so terminated the said prisoner shall serve the remainder of the sentence originally imposed, the unexpired term of imprisonment of any such prisoner to begin to run from the date he is returned to the institution, and time the prisoner was out on parole shall not be taken into account to diminish the time for which he was sentenced: Provided, That the parole board, at its discretion, may afterwards grant a new parole to said prisoner, in the event said board should deem it advisable.

SEC. 7. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of the act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That for any felony committed before this act takes effect, the penalty, sentence, or forfeiture provided by law for such felony at the time such felony was committed shall remain in full force and effect and shall be imposed, notwithstanding this act.

SEC. 8. Any person confined in a penal institution of the District of Columbia who escapes or attempts to escape therefrom, or any person who procures, advises, connives at, aids, or assists in such escape, or conceals any such prisoner after such escape, shall be guilty of an offense and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than five years, said sentence to begin, if the convicted person be an escaped prisoner, upon the expiration of the original sentence.

SEC. 9. Upon the appointment of the members of said board the powers of the existing parole board over prisoners confined in the penal institutions of the District of Columbia shall cease and determine and all the powers of said existing parole board under the authority of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes," as amended, over said prisoners confined in the penal institutions of the District of Columbia shall be transferred to and vested in said board of indeterminate sentence and parole: Provided, however, That in the case of a prisoner convicted of felony committed prior to the effective date of this act, and in the case of any prisoner convicted of misdemeanor when the aggregate sentence imposed is in excess of one year, said board of indeterminate sentence and parole may parole said prisoner, under the provisions of this act, after said prisoner has served one-fifth of the sentence imposed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill may be withdrawn temporarily.

The SPEAKER. This bill, as the Chair understands it, is an exact copy of the House bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland has the right to call up the House bill. The only question is whether we shall consider the Senate bill instead of the House bill. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to call up the House bill as a matter of right.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 10273.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin wish to consider that bill or the Senate bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I prefer to have the House bill considered, and after its completion, to then substitute the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10273) to establish a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the District of Columbia, and to determinate its functions, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent in connection with that that general debate be limited to 40 minutes, 20 minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 40 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10273.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10273, with Mr. BLOOM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the District of Columbia Board of Parole and Indeterminate Sentence.

I introduced the House bill. It came to me from the National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor. It is heartily indorsed by the General Federation of Women's Clubs. It is indorsed by the Department of Justice. It is indorsed by the District Commissioners, and it also has the indorsement of the District of Columbia Chamber of Commerce.

There is a great deal of confusion existing in the District concerning the application of the parole system. At the present time prisoners sentenced for offenses against the District of Columbia are subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal parole board.

The prisoners, in many cases, sentenced for District offenses, are confined in Federal institutions at Federal expense. The Federal parole board has enough to do with the great number of Federal cases that are submitted to it as to the merits of the parole applications, and prisoners of the District of Columbia are not given the consideration which their cases demand. The Federal board tries to pass on these District cases. The Federal board is confronted with all Federal cases, and the Department of Justice urges Congress to relieve the Federal board and the Department of Justice from the disposition of District parole cases.

In the District of Columbia we do not have the indeterminate sentence. This bill provides that a judge in sentencing a man shall give him a maximum as now fixed by law, and a minimum which shall be, in the case of the House bill, one-third of the maximum; in the case of the Senate bill, one-fifth of the maximum. That is the provision in felony cases. If this bill passes, hereafter in the District of Columbia a judge sentencing a man for a felony shall give a minimum and maximum sentence, and if the House bill passes, the minimum shall be one-third of the maximum; if the Senate bill passes, the minimum shall be one-fifth of the maximum. On the expiration of the minimum sentence the parole board will have a right to consider the application of the prisoner for parole. In the Federal jurisdiction, when a man has served one-third of his sentence, he is eligible to make parole application. Of course, it does not mean that because the minimum time has expired he will be freed, but it does mean that there will be a scientific study made of his case, of the man's character, of the effect prison servitude has had upon him, of the circumstances surrounding the crime, and if it is in the interest of society that the man be paroled, then he will be paroled.

A parole does not mean absolute freedom, as you all know. It means there will be supervision over the man paroled by a Government official. He will be required to report. There will be a check upon his activities; there will be a check so as to ascertain whether or not he actually reforms.

In the case of misdemeanors, the parole application shall not be eligible until six months have passed. I am told in the case of misdemeanors in the District of Columbia there are some people in the District who are sentenced for a misdemeanor and spend three or four months in jail; then they are out three or four months and then they go back in for three or four months, and they have a round of life like that.

These people who are honestly interested in prison reform say this is due to the fact that once they are free from prison they have no kind of supervision, and I am told this bill will furnish the supervision which will help the unfortunates to go straight.

My idea is that we should pass the Senate bill. At the proper time I shall offer amendments to the House bill to make it conform to the Senate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not had time to examine the Senate bill, although I have examined closely the House bill, which contains various amendments. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether the Senate bill as it passed the Senate is in the form of the House bill as originally introduced, or did it carry any amendment proposed by the House committee?

Mr. BLACK. As the bill passed the Senate it conforms practically with the House bill as I introduced it, but the Committee on the District of Columbia amended the House bill, and the main point of difference between the Senate and the House is on the period of the minimum sentence. The Senate insists on one-fifth and the House committee said one-third. One-third is the Federal law. I acceded to that amendment in the District Committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLACK. I yield; surely.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the plan of the Committee on the District of Columbia to consider the Senate bill, to offer various amendments of the committee to the Senate bill?

Mr. BLACK. I had rather hoped that we would consider the Senate bill and we would not have to do all of that amending, but in the present situation I suppose that is what we will be compelled to do unless the gentleman can help us out some way.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose of the Committee on the District of Columbia to offer the various committee amendments to the Senate bill?

Mr. BLACK. Yes. We want the Senate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I would suggest to the lady from New Jersey that as soon as the gentleman completes the time for general debate the lady from New Jersey move that the committee rise, and then ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be considered in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. The gentleman is not going to recede from the provision of the bill with reference to minimum sentence, is he?

Mr. BLACK. Yes. We want to.

Mr. MOUSER. For what reason?

Mr. BLACK. In the first place, these people who have given study to the subject, namely, the Department of Justice, this reform group, and the man at the head of local prisons, Captain Barnard, and others, thought that one-fifth was the proper minimum.

Mr. MOUSER. The committee had their suggestion on it.

Mr. BLACK. We had their suggestion on it, and the bill was drawn by these people. The bill has passed the Senate and in this form is acceptable to the committee.

Mr. MOUSER. This will expedite passage.

Mr. BLACK. Yes. It will take more time to amend the House bill than it will to pass the Senate bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly, the committee rose, and Mr. WOODRUM, having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLOOM, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10273) and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill (S. 1155) to establish a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes, be substituted for the House bill, H. R. 10273, and that the Senate bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established in the District of Columbia a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the penal institutions for said District, to consist of three members, residents of said District, to be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, none of which members shall be officially connected with the prison administration in any other capacity; that of the three members first appointed after the passage of this act, one shall be appointed for three years, one for five years, and one for seven years; thereafter all appointments, except such as may be made for the remainder of unexpired terms, shall be for the term of seven years. It shall be the duty of the Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole to examine into the physical, mental, and moral records of the prisoners committed to the penal institutions of the District; receive reports of wardens and other officials, including the psychiatrist; recommend the treatment which in their opinion is most conducive to the prisoners' reformation; and provide for a system of determining the proper time of release and the rehabilitation of the ex-prisoner in the community. The board shall adopt rules and regulations for its procedure, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The members of the board shall serve without compensation: Provided, That actual and necessary traveling expenses of the members of the board, incurred in the performance of duties under this act, shall be allowed and paid as herein provided.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole submitted?

Mrs. NORTON. That was my request.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand, the bill is now being read for amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has any action been taken on the committee amendments to section 1?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There has been no committee amendment offered to section 1.

Mr. STAFFORD. The copy of the bill I have is a copy of the Senate bill as it was reported to the Senate. I should like to inquire whether the Senate bill contains any of the amendments proposed by the House to the House bill?

Mr. BLACK. As I understand, the only point of difference between the two bills is the proportionate time of the minimum sentence.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice, Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill does contain one of the amendments that was reported by the House in that instead of the word "alienist" the word "psychiatrist" is substituted.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That hereafter, in imposing sentence on a person convicted in the District of Columbia of a felony, the justice or judge of the court imposing such sentence shall sentence the person for a maximum period, not exceeding the maximum fixed by law, and for a minimum period not exceeding one-fifth of the maximum period fixed by law, and any person so convicted and sentenced may be released on parole as herein provided at any time after having served the minimum sentence: Provided, however, That this act shall not abrogate the power of the justice or judge to sentence a convicted prisoner to the death penalty as now or hereafter may be provided by law: Provided further, That where a justice or a judge of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has imposed a life sentence on the prisoner convicted in the District of Columbia, said prisoner serving such sentence shall be eligible to parole as herein provided at any time after having served 15 years of his life's sentence.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I assume the gentleman from New York wishes to offer an amendment to strike out "one-fifth" and insert "one-third."

Mr. BLACK. No; I do not. The intention of the House committee now is to accept the Senate's idea of one-fifth.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the gentleman has changed front since he made his previous statement?

Mr. BLACK. No; I have not. I do not think the gentleman understood me.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no doubt but what I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. I said that originally the House bill contained the figure "one-fifth." The House committee amended this to "one-third." In reply to a question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOUSER] I stated that the committee wanted to take the Senate's amendments largely for the sake of expedition, and because those who favored the bill favored the Senate's idea.

Mr. BOWMAN. One-fifth instead of one-third.

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not planned to offer any amendment to the Senate bill, then, is it?

Mr. BLACK. It is not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I made inquiry as to whether it was the purpose of the committee to offer the committee amendments, and I received an affirmative reply.

Mr. BLACK. That was to the House bill. We were then considering the House bill, and we were then trying to make the House bill by amendment conform with the Senate bill.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. If said Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole, or any member thereof, shall have reliable information that a prisoner has violated his parole, said board, or any member thereof, at any time within the term or terms of the prisoner's sentence, may issue a warrant to any officer hereinafter authorized to execute the same for the retaking of such prisoner. Any officer of the penal institution from which such prisoner shall have been paroled or any Federal officer authorized to serve criminal process within the United States to whom such warrant shall be delivered is authorized and required to execute such warrant by taking such prisoner and returning him to said penal institution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I think the House will be interested in a very important provision in this bill that makes it mandatory upon the parole board to parole life prisoners after the service of 15 years. There is no discretion, as I read the bill, in the parole board which gives them any privilege of keeping a prisoner in confinement, but this bill mandatorily compels them to give them freedom under parole after the service of 15 years. I rise to inquire whether there is any similar legislation in any other State of the Union granting parole to life prisoners after the service of 15 years. I am basing my inquiry on the provision contained in section 3, which makes it mandatory upon the parole board to parole a life prisoner after the service of 15 years.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman, I am sure, does not hold that the bill makes it mandatory that such a man be granted a parole but that the bill provides he shall be eligible for parole.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stand corrected. Can the gentleman inform the House whether other States have any similar legislation so far as life prisoners are concerned?

Mr. BLACK. I honestly can not. I do not know of any. I do not think our State does. I want to say to the gentleman that there has been such a bad reaction from the viewpoint of society against life sentences that in New York State they are about to repeal some of these very rigorous sentences as provided under the Baumes law. It is considered that society has not been benefited by such rigorous procedure, but that such laws have brought about more criminals, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was not referring to the Baumes law, which provides that when a person has committed the fourth offense he shall be imprisoned for life. That is true not only in New York but in Michigan, where they copied the same provision of law. There has been a righteous protest against that impractical method of imposing life sentence upon a person who commits a misdemeanor or a minor felony.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MOUSER. I did not hear the reply of the gentleman from New York about making this mandatory.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was in error. It is that he shall be eligible for parole.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. As I understand, the protest was not against that law, but it arose in a prohibition case and not from a real crime as we have ordinarily understood it. Is there any contrary opinion as to that law on ordinary crimes?

Mr. STAFFORD. It applies not only to prohibition offenses, but it applies to all crimes. It is these insignificant cases which bring out very pointedly the injustice of imposing life imprisonment upon a person who happens to commit an offense on the fourth occasion. There is no justification for imposing a life sentence upon a person who has simply committed a crime of minor importance for the fourth time.

Mr. KELLER. Is there any justification for turning loose an habitual criminal?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at all; but take, for instance, the administration in the Army and Navy. The attention of the Committee on Military Affairs has been called to many instances where an enlisted man has been guilty of minor infractions, of drunkenness and going away for a short time without leave, and in such cases very harsh sentences have been imposed. Those cases do not warrant the imposition of life imprisonment.

Mr. KELLER. That is not a crime.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was a fanatical provision supported by fanatics. It has been clearly proven it is the result of the work of fanatics.

Mr. KELLER. I do not agree with that conclusion.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Illinois says he does not agree with that conclusion, but there are any number of cases where it carries them to that ridiculous extreme, the punishment of a man for life simply because he has been guilty, perhaps, of four times committing a minor offense. Such punishment does not fit the crime.

Under the law the judges should be given discretion to determine what the punishment should be. The modern theory is that it should be left to the judges to determine the punishment. The Baumes law and the Michigan law, which followed in its wake, made the punishment mandatory and took away the discretion of the judges. That law provided that life imprisonment should be imposed if a man committed a crime the fourth time, no matter what the crime might be.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MOUSER. Does not the gentleman think that if a prisoner's behavior was good and he had a good record for 15 years that under this language it would be the duty of the parole board to parole him?

Mr. STAFFORD. I subscribe to the provision in this bill which makes it mandatory upon the board to consider whether he is entitled to parole. If a man has a very bad record and he is criminally inclined, perhaps it is better for society that he be kept in prison.

Mr. MOUSER. I agree with the gentleman that this language is not mandatory that they grant a parole, but does not the gentleman think, in view of the language, that if a man's record has been good for 15 years it would be the duty of the board to act favorably upon his application for parole?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the duty of the board to consider whether he is entitled to parole, as this bill provides.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. Any person confined in a penal institution of the District of Columbia who escapes or attempts to escape therefrom, or any person who procures, advises, connives at, aids, or assists in such escape, or conceals any such prisoner after such escape, shall be guilty of an offense and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than five years, said sentence to begin, if the convicted person be an escaped prisoner, upon the expiration of the original sentence.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is quite in keeping with the modern methods of treating the punishment of crime. The bill is carefully drawn and I believe has taken advantage of the experience in many States.

This still leaves us with the question of whether prison is the solution of our criminal problems, and it also brings to mind very forcefully, in this particular period, how the public attitude—or may I say the legislative mind—has been accustomed to the necessity of providing penal accommodation, and yet will recoil and hesitate if demand is made for the same kind of accommodation based upon need rather than crime. For instance, if an individual walks down Pennsylvania Avenue and deliberately takes a brick, throws it into a jeweler's window, and reaches in and takes a handful of jewelry, the law provides that he shall be taken into custody, given a fair and impartial trial, and, after conviction, we provide for his accommodation, housing, shelter, clothing, food, medical treatment, and, in most penal institutions, recreation and education. Yet another individual, not criminally inclined but unemployed may walk up and down Pennsylvania Avenue until he drops from starvation, and if we suggest that in the event of unemployment, where a citizen becomes in need and is entirely destitute, the State shall make provision for his care, we are immediately confronted with all sorts of constitutional objections, theories of government, and sometimes, from very high sources, with slogans of "rugged individualism."

There is no objection to this bill. Crime, unfortunately, is on the increase. I believe if we separate the crimes of violence, crimes of passion, and would make a careful analysis, after excluding artificial crimes created by fanatical laws, we would find that a great many of the inmates of penal institutions are the victims of economic conditions.

While, of course, a parole bill for the District of Columbia is necessary, we should be devoting time and study to the prevention of crime to the extent of where crime is the result of economic conditions, beyond the control of the individual. If an individual commits a crime of violence, his act is a crime against society, and we provide punishment; but there is no provision for the crime of society against an individual, and when you have an economic condition or a depression or a financial crisis, call it whatever you will, where the willing individual is unable to find employment, is unable to obtain food and shelter for himself and his family, then society is committing a crime against him.

This may seem a little far-fetched to some of my conservative friends here to-day, but just as sure as we are sitting here, the time is not distant, after having finished a complete code of punishment for crimes of the individual against society, when we will have to provide preventive measures and cures for the present crimes of society against the individual. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 10273) was laid on the table.

PLUMBING AND GAS FITTING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3400) to amend an act of Congress approved June 18, 1898, entitled "An act to regulate plumbing and gas fitting in the District of Columbia," a similar House bill being on the calendar, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 3 and 4 of the act of Congress approved June 18, 1898, entitled "An act to regulate plumbing and gas fitting in the District of Columbia," be, and the same are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That applicants for licenses as master plumbers and gas fitters or master gas fitters, who are citizens of the United States, must be 21 years of age, must make application in their own handwriting, and must accompany such application with a certificate as to good character signed by at least three reputable residents of the District of Columbia, two of whom shall certify that the applicants have had at least four years' experience in the plumbing and gas-fitting business.

"SEC. 4. That all renewals of existing licenses and all new licenses as a master plumber and gas fitter or master gas fitter shall be for a period of not more than one year and that the fee for such license shall be not less than $25 nor more than $50 per annum, to be fixed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, for a license year beginning January 1 and ending December 31. Such special license fee shall be separate from, or in addition to any contractors' or business license tax, hereafter fixed for this and similar occupations by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia according to law. Licenses issued at any time after the beginning of the year shall date from the first day of the month in which the license is issued and end on the last day of the license year, and payment shall be made of a proportional amount of the annual license fee. Any licensee may apply for and receive a license for or on behalf of any firm, copartnership, or corporation that he is a bona fide member of, or a substantial stockholder in, but all plumbing or gas fitting done pursuant to such license shall be done under the immediate personal supervision of the licensed man.

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia or their duly authorized agent shall have the power to suspend or revoke any plumber's or gas fitter's license for a violation of the plumbing or gas-fitting regulations after a public hearing granted the licensee or after conviction in court for such violation or for conduct involving moral turpitude. This act shall become effective on the 1st day of January following its enactment."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in the Senate bill they have left out the provision in the House bill, after the word "business," in line 6, page 2, relating to nonresident applicants for license as master plumber. Is the committee in sympathy with the idea of making no provision for nonresident applicants for licenses?

Certainly you ought to give an opportunity for persons living outside of the District who are master plumbers, and who have occasion to bid on public works, to obtain a permit.

Mr. PALMISANO. I may state to the gentleman that starting with section 3 it says:

That applicants for licenses as master plumbers and gasfitters or master gasfitters, citizens of the United States—

And so forth.

That, of course, eliminates the objectionable feature that the gentleman speaks of. It permits citizens of the United States anywhere to make application to become master plumbers.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not sympathetically inclined toward a bill which would require the exaction of a fee to secure a license of $25 or $50, at the ipse dixit of the Commissioners of the District. The present fee is $3. Now, you want to load down the plumbing business by requiring a master plumber to pay $25 or $50.

Will some member of the committee justify that outrageous increase, which will certainly be spread over the people of the District, when you exact that exorbitant fee, for merely exercising a master plumber's license.

Mrs. NORTON. I may say to the gentleman that this is entirely in accord with the fees paid in other businesses in the District. We find it is true in all the States.

Mr. STAFFORD. The other day we passed an omnibus bill requiring fees of various character, varying from $5 for a beauty parlor to $100 or $200 for allowing a circus to perform in the District. Here you are exacting a fee of $25 to $50, and I think it is rather exorbitant.

Mrs. NORTON. Is it not in accord with the fees paid in other States?

Mr. STAFFORD. I speak offhand as far as other States are concerned, the city I have the privilege in part to represent does not exact a fee of $25 or $50 for a master plumber's license. The purpose of the bill is to hold a little more strictly the requirements for the qualification—some persons have not had the requisite knowledge, and some people have lost their lives by reason of their negligence in the performance of duty. But this bill in its requirements goes beyond what I deem reasonable.

Mr. MOUSER. It is going to eliminate a lot of worthy people, and is a higher fee than in any place I know of.

Mr. STAFFORD. It drives out of employment many plumbers who would like to ply their trade in the District. Fifty dollars is a heavy fee for a master plumber to pay.

Mrs. NORTON. In the hearings held before the subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. PALMISANO, was chairman, there was no objection made to the amount of the fee.

Mr. MOUSER. But that is no reason why somebody should not rise to object to it on the floor of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. It might be to the interest of a few big master plumbers to keep out some small master plumbers. When you exact a fee of $50 per annum for a man to do some small itinerant plumbing work in the District, you will be driving out a lot of people from making a living, and forcing the business into the hands of a few.

Mr. MOUSER. You are taking away the possibility of earning a livelihood.

Mr. STAFFORD. You are taking away the opportunity to earn a livelihood from many journeyman plumbers.

Mr. MOUSER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not believe that that high fee should be in the bill. The bill is all right in its general purpose, but when you come to increase the fee from $3 to $50, you are going far afield from the real purpose of the bill.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HOLMES. I think the gentleman is unduly alarmed over this situation. I know in my State, and in several States of the Union, almost all of the master plumbers pay a fee of more than $3 for a license.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman know of any place where they pay $50?

Mr. HOLMES. I read from a letter signed by the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia to the chairman of the committee, Mrs. NORTON, dated January 26, 1932:

> Annual license fees for master plumbers' licenses in the eight hundred and odd cities where such licenses are issued vary from $10 to $100 per annum.

I think in my State the master plumbers' fee is $25, and the gentleman must realize that we can not promiscuously allow any man with a kit of tools to go out and handle a matter of plumbing in our respective communities, which may affect the health of the community.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MOUSER. As far as a man's fitness to perform his job is concerned the amount of money that he pays for a fee has nothing to do with that, but when you are charging him $50 a year in times like these, you are taking away the right of a great many men who are qualified plumbers to earn a livelihood.

Mr. HOLMES. The gentleman knows that a matter of $50 a year on the plumbing contracts during the year is a rather insignificant sum.

Mr. MOUSER. But what has that to do with a man's efficiency? Whether or not he can pay $50 has nothing to do with the question of the efficiency of his work.

Mr. HOLMES. I realize that.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the burden on the District of Columbia for determining the qualifications of these master plumbers? Surely it is nothing like $50 a year, because this is going to be paid right along.

Mr. HOLMES. I think the gentleman is wrong. I think it costs that amount of money to examine these men.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman know whether they have a plumbing inspector in the District?

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe they have.

Mr. GOSS. Then all of the work done by these master plumbers has to be inspected by the plumbing inspector before the building is accepted, does it not?

Mr. MOUSER. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Then that is the protection.

Mr. MOUSER. You do not need $50 to protect it.

Mr. GOSS. No; but it seems to me that the mere fact that we license them, after we discover whether their work is right or wrong, keeps a better check upon the matter, from the standpoint of health and safety.

Why arbitrarily tax a man out of business, especially in times like these?

Mr. BLACK. The District Commissioners try to figure the license fee to cover the actual cost of the supervision involved. That has been their policy.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PALMISANO. What would the gentleman suggest so far as the fee is concerned? Three dollars is not sufficient to pay the expense of the fee.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should say $10.

Mr. PALMISANO. Ten to twenty-five dollars?

Mr. STAFFORD. That would be acceptable.

Mrs. NORTON. The committee will accept an amendment of that kind.

Mr. MOUSER. Will that cover the expense?

Mr. PALMISANO. It seems to me that that should take care of the expense.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD to the Senate bill: Page 2, line 10, strike out "$25" and insert "$10," and on page 2, line 11, strike out "$50" and insert "$25."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in order to make this comment, particularly to the gentleman who raised the question as to the amount of the fee. In cities where we have licensing boards for plumbers, it has not been the official fee that has been burdensome, and that kept many from getting a license, but it has been rather the unofficial fee. So let us hope that in the District of Columbia all they have to pay is the official fee. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on the following dates present to the President, for his approval, a joint resolution and bills of the House of the following titles:

On July 9, 1932:

H. J. Res. 336. Joint resolution construing section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930; and

H. R. 10600. An act to exempt from the quota husbands of American citizens.

On July 11, 1932:

H. R. 7939. An act to authorize the presentation of a distinguished-flying cross to Russell N. Boardman and John L. Polando, and Wiley Post and Harold Gatty, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10246. An act to fix the fees to be charged for the issue of domestic money orders;

H. R. 10494. An act to provide a postage charge on notices to publishers regarding undeliverable second-class matter; and

H. R. 12445. An act to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by providing for and expediting a public-works program.

GAME AND BIRD SANCTUARY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3792) to amend sections 5 and 6 of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act to prohibit the killing of wild birds and wild animals in the District of Columbia," and thereby to establish a game and bird sanctuary of the Potomac River and its tributaries in the said District, a similar House bill (H. R. 10359) being on the calendar; and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey?

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to consideration of the bill H. R. 10359 in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask when the Chair expects to take up the message from the President just received?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what it is. It is not customary to take it up until it has been opened.

Mr. SNELL. I agree it is not customary, but will the Speaker state when he expects to take it up?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. It has not yet been opened.

GAME AND BIRD SANCTUARY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Is there objection to consideration of the bill H. R. 10359 in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

VETO MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES ON GENERAL RELIEF BILL (H. DOC. NO. 360)

The SPEAKER. The House will suspend consideration of the bill H. R. 10359 in order to allow the Chair to lay before the House a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-seven Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. WOODRUM]. Three hundred and twenty-eight Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning herewith, without my approval, H. R. 12445, "Emergency relief and construction act of 1932."

On the 31st of May last I addressed the Senate recommending further definite and large-scale measures to aid in relief of distress and unemployment imposed upon us by the continued degeneration in the world economic situation. These proposals were made after discussion with leaders of both political parties in Congress and in endeavor to secure united nonpartisan action.

They were in brief:

1. Authorization to the Reconstruction Corporation to loan up to $300,000,000 to State governments which are unable to finance themselves to care for distress, such loans to be made upon the basis of need.

2. Authorization to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to buy bonds or otherwise temporarily to finance public bodies and to provide part of needed loans in limited cases also to private industry, to increase employment through construction of sound self-liquidating or income-producing projects.

3. Authorization to the corporation to undertake to finance exports of agricultural products and to make loans to institutions on the security of agricultural commodities in order to assure the carrying of normal stocks and the orderly marketing of these commodities.

4. To increase authority of the corporation to issue securities by a further $1,500,000,000.

The bill now under consideration consists of three titles, of which I shall first refer to Title I and Title III:

TITLE I

As this title has been amended, it now stands in accord with my recommendation.

TITLE III

This portion of the measure proposes to expend $322,000,000 on public works. I have expressed myself at various times upon the extreme undesirability of increasing expenditure on nonproductive public works beyond the $500,000,000 of construction already in the Budget. It is an ultimate burden upon the taxpayer. It unbalances the Budget after all our efforts to attain that object. It does not accomplish the purpose in creating employment for which it is designed, as is shown by the reports of the technical heads of the bureaus concerned that the total annual direct employment under this program would be less than 100,000 out of the 8,000,000 unemployed. Strongly as I feel that this departs from sound public finance, and that it does not accomplish the purpose for which it is instituted, I am not prepared for this reason alone to withhold my assent to the bill provided there is a proper provision that (except for expenditure on public roads which is deductible from future appropriations, together with park and forest roads and trails) these works should not be initiated except on certificate of the Secretary of the Treasury that the moneys necessary for such expenditure are available, or can be obtained, without interference with current financing operations of the Government. The expression of this principle in the present bill is not in this form and is not adequate.

TITLE II

This title is the major extension of the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation itself was warranted only as a temporary measure to safely pass a grave national emergency which would otherwise have plunged us into destructive panic in consequence of the financial collapse in Europe. Its purpose was to preserve the credit structure of the Nation and thereby protect every individual in his employment, his farm, his bank deposits, his insurance policy, and his other savings, all of which are directly or indirectly in the safe-keeping of the great fiduciary institutions. Its authority was limited practically to loans to institutions which are under Federal or State control or regulation and affected with public interest. These functions were and are in the interest of the whole people.

Our problem now is to further widen the activities of the Reconstruction Corporation in the field of employment, and to further strengthen agriculture in such a practical fashion as will benefit the whole people, as will not damage any part of the people, and confer no special privileges upon any of the people.

So far as those portions of the proposed extension of authority to the corporation provide authorization temporarily to finance self-liquidating works up to the sum of $1,500,000,000, it is in accord with my recommendations. The section dealing with agricultural relief does not provide for loans to sound institutions upon the security of agricultural products in order to assist in production and finance of normal holdings and stocks of these commodities and thus aid in the orderly marketing of agricultural products so sorely needed at the present time. Such action would contribute to improve price levels of farm products.

There are several secondary objections to this title with which I will not trouble the Congress, because my major objection to the measure, as now formulated, lies in the inclusion of an extraordinary extension of authority to the Reconstruction Corporation to make loans to "individuals, to trusts, estates, partnerships, corporations (public or quasi public or private), to associations, joint-stock companies, States, political subdivisions of States, municipalities, or political subdivisions thereof." The following objections are directed to this particular provision:

First. This expansion of authority of the Reconstruction Corporation would mean loans against security for any conceivable purpose on any conceivable security to anybody who wants money. It would place the Government in private business in such fashion as to violate the very principle of public relations upon which we have builded our Nation, and render insecure its very foundations. Such action would make the Reconstruction Corporation the greatest banking and money-lending institution of all history. It would constitute a gigantic centralization of banking and finance to which the American people have been properly opposed for the past 100 years. The purpose of the expansion is no longer in the spirit of solving a great major emergency but to establish a privilege whether it serves a great national end or not.

Second. One of the most serious objections is that under the provisions of this bill those amongst 16,000 municipalities and the different States that have failed courageously to meet their responsibilities and to balance their own budgets would dump their financial liabilities and problems upon the Federal Government. All proper and insuperable difficulties they may confront in providing relief for distress are fully and carefully met under other provisions in the bill.

Third. The board of directors of the Reconstruction Corporation inform me unanimously that miscellaneous loans under this provision are totally impracticable and unworkable. It would be necessary to set up a huge bureaucracy, to establish branches in every county and town in the United States. The task of organization, of finding competent personnel, would not be a matter of months but of years. Hundreds of thousands of applications representing every diversity of business and interest in the country would immediately flood the board, all of which must be passed upon by seven men. The directors would be dependent upon the ability and integrity of local committees and branch managers. Every political pressure would be assembled for particular persons. It would be within the power of these agencies to dictate the welfare of millions of people, to discriminate between competitive business at will, and to deal favor and disaster amongst them. If it be contended that these hundreds of thousands of miscellaneous loans will be used to increase employment, then an additional bureaucracy for espionage must follow up each case and assure that these funds be used for such purpose.

Fourth. The sole limitation under the bill is that loans shall be secured and that the borrowers shall not have been able to obtain loans from private institutions upon acceptable terms. This at once throws upon the corporation all the doubtful loans in the United States. It would result in every financial institution calling upon their customers whom they regard as less adequately secured to discharge their loans and to demand the money from the Government through the Reconstruction Corporation. The organization would be constantly subjected to conspiracies and raids of predatory interests, individuals, and private corporations. Huge losses and great scandals must inevitably result. It would mean the squandering of hundreds of millions of public funds to be ultimately borne by the taxpayer.

Fifth. The bill provides only the funds to the corporation which the Senate with reason deemed the minimum necessary to aid construction projects and to cover loans to the States in aid of distress. There is, therefore, no provision in the bill for any sum of money for the purpose of these miscellaneous loans. The corporation would thereby be charged with a duty impossible to carry out in practice with no additional funds with which to make loans unless the unemployment projects and the loans to the States are abandoned or seriously curtailed and the fundamental purpose of the legislation defeated.

Sixth. Under the new obligations upon the Reconstruction Corporation to finance the additional construction activities and loans to the States in addition to its present activities, it will be necessary for the corporation to place over $3,000,000,000 of securities. It can place these securities only because the credit of the United States is pledged to secure these obligations. To sell any such vast amount of securities at a time like this is a difficult-enough task, strong as is the credit of the United States, without having the credit of the Government undermined by the character of use to which it is directed that these moneys should be applied. As long as obligations of the corporation are based on wholly sound securities for self-liquidating purposes, of which early repayment is assured, there is no burden upon the taxpayer. There is an assurance of a strengthening of the economic situation. But if the funds of the corporation are to be squandered by making loans for the purposes here referred to, it will be at once evident that the credit of the Government is being misused, and it is not too much to say that if such a measure should become law it further weakens the whole economic situation by threatening the credit of the United States Government with grave consequences of disaster to our people.

CONCLUSION

This proposal violates every sound principle of public finance and of government. Never before has so dangerous a suggestion been seriously made to our country. Never before has so much power for evil been placed at the unlimited discretion of seven individuals.

In view of the short time left to the Congress for consideration of this legislation and of the urgent need for sound relief measures, the necessity of which I have on several occasions urged upon the Congress, I recommend that a compromise should be reached upon terms suggested by members of both Houses and both parties, and that the Congress should not adjourn until this is accomplished. Such compromise proposal should embrace:

First. Title I of H. R. 12445, the act now under consideration, covering provisions for loans to States in amount of $300,000,000 for the care of distress in States where needed.

Second. Title III of this act, with the provision made applicable to all parts of the title except for roads and trails, that such works shall not be initiated except on certificate of the Secretary of the Treasury that the funds necessary are available and can be obtained without interference with the current financing operations of the Government.

Third. That there should be substituted for Title II the substance of the provisions in the substitute bill introduced by Senator WAGNER and passed by the Senate, or Senate bill 4822, introduced by Senator BARBOUR, or section 4 of the substitute bill, introduced by Representative HAWLEY. Among them they provide not only loans for construction work of projects of self-liquidating character but also essential aids to agriculture.

Fourth. That the corporation be authorized to increase its issues of capital by $1,800,000,000 for these purposes.

With the utmost seriousness I urge the Congress to enact a relief measure, but I can not approve the measure before me, fraught as it is with possibilities of misfeasance and special privileges, so impracticable of administration, so dangerous to public credit, and so damaging to our whole conception of governmental relations to the people as to bring far more distress than it will cure.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 11, 1932.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objections of the President will be spread upon the Journal.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and the bill to which it refers be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and that the message be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, moves——

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the motion first.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the motion first, and the gentleman can make his point of order.

The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, moves that the veto message of the President of the United States and the bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the question before the House has not been stated by the Speaker pro tempore. The question prescribed by the Constitution is whether the House, upon reconsideration, will pass the bill, the veto of the President to the contrary notwithstanding; and when that question has been stated, or if it may be assumed that it was stated, I desire to prefer a parliamentary inquiry whether, under the rules of the House, I may not be recognized to move upon that question, the previous question, as a preferential motion under paragraph 4 of Rule XVI.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the preferential motion in this case to be the motion which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has made, namely, a motion to refer to the committee.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. May I pursue the matter further, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The question before the House, being that of consideration of the veto message of the President, of course is a matter of debate. Upon that reconsideration debate may be shut off by ordering the previous question.

Paragraph 4 of Rule XVI of the rules of the House provides that—

> When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motions shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer, or to amend, or postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order.

Some of those motions are not applicable to a veto message, but where they are applicable, I submit to the Chair that they have precedence in the order stated. Therefore I desire to be recognized for the purpose of moving the previous question on the question of reconsideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Illinois, but the Chair will consider the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under the practice of the House, the question on a veto message is considered as pending, and there are three motions that are preferential. Any Member securing recognition for the purpose may move to postpone, or may move to refer, or may move to lay on the table.

Of course, a motion for the previous question is in order; but the gentleman would not be entitled to prior recognition over the Member in charge of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Missouri has stated the matter correctly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman will admit that whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is entitled to prior recognition will depend upon the nature of the gentleman's motion? If his motion is preferential, he is entitled to recognition for the purpose of making it, whether the other motion has been made prior to his or not.

Mr. CANNON. The motion to refer is preferential; the motion has been made by the Member in charge, and the motion is therefore before the House.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on my motion.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What does the gentleman say as to my application of paragraph 4 of Rule XVI?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], representing the Committee on Ways and Means, is entitled to prior recognition to move to refer, and on that motion he also is entitled to prior recognition to demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair thinks that under the rules of the House, the gentleman from Illinois has a right to make a preferential motion to refer to a committee. On that motion the gentleman has the right to control one hour of time or the right to move the previous question. The gentleman has been recognized and has now moved the previous question.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] yield for a question before the motion is put?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand the attitude of the majority in making this motion is that this bill is killed for this session and there will be no further move to pass it over the presidential veto?

Mr. RAINEY. No; that is not the attitude at all. The attitude is to stop unnecessary debate on the floor. We have debated it at great length. We wish to put up to the committee the question of sending here a bill complying with the President's suggestions, if possible. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 2704. An act for the relief of Charles Lamkin; and

H. J. Res. 361. Joint resolution to authorize the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service to make a survey as to the existing facilities for the protection of the public health in the care and treatment of leprous persons in the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11897) entitled "An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes."

GAME AND BIRD SANCTUARY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the nature of the legislation the gentlewoman from New Jersey called up for present consideration a moment ago, to which I objected.

I withdraw my objection and wish to say I am heartily in favor of this bill which protects wild life along the Potomac River, and I want to congratulate the gentlewoman from New Jersey upon bringing it in.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my objection to the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2792) to amend sections 5 and 6 of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act to prohibit the killing of wild birds and wild animals in the District of Columbia," and thereby to establish a game and bird sanctuary of the Potomac River and its tributaries in the said District, and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from New Jersey calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. GOSS. I reserve the right to object for the purpose of making an inquiry. Will the gentlewoman from New Jersey advise me if the bill prohibits the hunting of all wild life on the Potomac River?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Do I understand there will be no hunting allowed on the Potomac River and its tributaries?

Mrs. NORTON. Is it not a fact there never has been much hunting on the Potomac River?

Mr. GOSS. Oh, no. There are many duck blinds on the river below the District of Columbia.

Mrs. NORTON. This bill does not apply to the river below the District of Columbia.

Mr. GOSS. That is what I am trying to get at. This bill just applies to the District of Columbia?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes; just to the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 808), entitled "An act to prohibit the killing of wild birds and wild animals in the District of Columbia," is hereby amended by striking out the words "with any boat propelled by any means other than oars," so that the said section as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That no person in the District of Columbia shall at any time hunt, pursue, or needlessly disturb any wild duck, goose, or other waterfowl, in any of the waters of the District of Columbia, under penalty of $10 or imprisonment in the workhouse for not more than 30 days, or both, for each offense."

SEC. 2. That section 6 of the said act of June 30, 1906, is hereby amended by striking out the words: "But nothing in this act shall prevent the hunting of game birds on the marshes of the Anacostia River, or Eastern Branch, north of the Anacostia Bridge, and on the marshes on the Virginia shore of the Potomac River east of the Aqueduct Bridge: Provided, That said birds are not hunted within 200 yards of any bridge or dwelling," so that said section as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 10359) was laid on the table.

NATIONAL ISSUES

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to come to the Committee on Rules, which is considering a matter of great importance. I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following recent statement made to my constituency:

I had entertained the hope that Congress would conclude its legislative program and adjourn in time for me to return home and give my people a personal account of my stewardship as their public servant.

At this time it looks improbable that Congress will adjourn in time for me to carry out this much-desired plan.

10,000,000 JOBLESS MEN

With 10,000,000 men walking the streets and highways of our country out of work and important legislation pending before Congress to provide for their relief, I can not get my consent to leave my post of labor here and come home to work for my renomination when I feel it is my plain duty to stay on the job and work to help the people who have elected me as their representative.

NATIONAL DEMOCRACY

The Democratic Party of the Nation has met in convention at Chicago, declared its platform, and selected its candidates by nominating Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York, for President and our own Speaker of the House of Representatives, Hon. JOHN N. GARNER, of Texas, for Vice President.

There will, no doubt, be many who will be of the opinion that the party in its platform went farther than was necessary in declaring for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment instead of declaring for the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the States.

DEMOCRATS OF TEXAS WILL SETTLE QUESTION

However, this question will not very greatly disturb the Democracy of Texas at this time for the reason that the Democrats in Texas have decided for the time being to settle the question for themselves in their own way.

When the Democratic executive committee of Texas decided to place the referendum of the eighteenth amendment on the primary ballot on the 23d of July it thereby gave the Democratic men and women of Texas the right to express themselves directly on the question of whether or not they favor a referendum of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

EQUIVALENT TO INSTRUCTIONS

This action will give to every Congressman from the State of Texas direct information as to the express wishes of his constituents as to how they wish him to vote on this question when it comes before the next Congress.

Upon a former occasion I publicly stated my views regarding the July primary referendum of the eighteenth amendment.

No one can question the inherent right of the people to alter, change, or amend their fundamental law as the necessities and conditions of the times require.

My position upon the prohibition question for the past quarter of a century in Texas is so well known that comment with reference to the same is unnecessary.

I have always believed, and believe now, that the sale and manufacture of alcoholic liquors, and their dispensation through the open saloon is one of the worst enemies of the human race; and should I now declare otherwise I would be untrue to my own ideals and unworthy of the confidence and trust of my people.

The question of prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, either State or National, should never become a political question to be used as a yardstick to measure the usefulness of men for public service. This was my position in my first race for Congress from the State at large of Texas in 1912, and it is my position to-day.

Prohibition is a great moral and economic question that belongs to the people themselves, and they should have the right to determine for themselves whether or not they wish the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors prohibited or permitted in their country under laws and regulations set up by their own legislative authority.

Therefore, in keeping with my former statement and without surrendering the convictions of a lifetime upon this subject, but yielding alone to a direct mandate from my people, I repeat that I am willing for my constituents to pass on this or any other question for themselves; and should a majority of the Democratic men and women of my district vote for the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment in the July primaries if I am returned to Congress, I will feel that I am in duty bound, as their representative, to respect and obey their will, and I will do so when the matter comes up before Congress for action by casting my vote in obedience to the will of my people as expressed at the ballot box.

BEGAN SERVICE UNDER PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON

I shall always be grateful to the Democrats of Texas for the honor they conferred upon me in 1912, by nominating me for Congressman at large from the State, thereby permitting me to begin my public service under the leadership of that great President, Woodrow Wilson.

WILSON LEADERSHIP

Under the matchless leadership of President Wilson the Sixty-third and Sixty-fifth Congresses enacted a forward-looking progressive and constructive legislative program in the interest of all the people that stands without a parallel in the history of this Republic—I shall always be glad that I was permitted to play my humble part of helpfulness in those days and that time.

REPRESENTING EIGHTH DISTRICT

Since I have had the honor to represent the eighth district it has been my one purpose to serve all the people in every walk of life without regard to class or creed, devoting myself wholeheartedly to the service of all.

HOUSTON

Since I have been the direct representative of the eighth district I believe I can truthfully say, without boasting, that I have guarded well every interest of our great and growing city, and have done as much for the development of all her industries, including our great ship channel, as any man that ever represented this district in Congress.

EX-SERVICE MEN

No greater patriotic devotion hath any man than this—to offer his life for his country—no greater duty hath any Government than this—to care for its disabled soldiers, their widows, and orphans.

My flesh and my blood were in the World War, and those boys who offered their lives as a living sacrifice to their country are my heroes of yesterday.

BONUS BILL

In view of what the Government is doing for the railroads, banks, insurance companies, and the vast sums of money it has loaned to them during these perilous times, I thought it was nothing but the plain duty of the Government to mature the adjusted-compensation certificates of the World War veterans and pay them now. Therefore, I voted to pay the bonus now. It has been a pleasure to me to serve the veterans of all wars.

I have handled over 2,000 compensation cases of World War veterans before the Veterans' Bureau, recovering many thousands of dollars for them, their widows, and children that they would never have received.

SPANISH WAR VETERANS

I have secured pensions for over 500 Spanish War veterans.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE

It was by my vote in the Sixty-fifth Congress that the nineteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, giving to our womenfolk the right to vote, was adopted. Had I been absent upon this occasion our women would not be voting to-day, as the amendment was adopted by one vote.

LABOR RECORD 100 PER CENT

I am willing for the labor people themselves to tell you how I have stood by them and how I have voted for all legislation having for its purpose the betterment of working and living conditions for laboring men and women everywhere. Ask any man or woman of any labor craft in Houston—he will tell you.

LAND-LOAN BANK

I supported the Federal land-loan bank law whereby our farmers have been able to borrow money at a low rate of interest to aid them in buying a home and otherwise assist them in carrying on their agricultural activities.

HOME LOAN BILL

I joined in helping to secure a favorable report from my Committee on Rules at the present session of Congress on a rule for the immediate consideration of the Federal home loan bank bill, which is intended to aid the people living in cities and towns to buy a home on long time and at low interest. I voted for this bill. It passed the House and is now pending in the Senate.

FARMERS—DAIRYMEN—TRUCK GROWERS

I have been the steadfast friend of the farmers, cattlemen, dairymen, and truck growers, and have earnestly insisted that the Government extend to them the same consideration and financial aid that it is so generously extending to others in these dark hours of depression.

MORATORIUM AND CANCELLATION OF FOREIGN DEBTS

There is much agitation throughout the country to-day for a general moratorium or cancellation of the debts owing the United States by foreign countries on account of the World War.

During the present session of Congress a moratorium of the interest due the United States on all foreign debts to the amount of over $250,000,000 owing us by our allies in the World War was granted by a resolution passed by Congress.

In my opinion this action was indefensible. I have consistently opposed the reduction of debts owing our country by foreign nations, and I shall continue to oppose any legislation looking to the reduction or cancellation of this indebtedness.

ECONOMY AND RELIEF

I have voted for the reduction of governmental expenses to the minimum, including the reduction of my own salary and allowances just in the same proportion that other governmental employees have been reduced.

CONCLUSION

My friends, our country is in the midst of a terrible economic depression—unequaled in the memory of anyone now living—the produce of our farms, gardens, and dairies selling far below the cost of production, while millions of our people are out of employment and hungry, and our warehouses and factories are crowded with surplus goods, but on account of our shortsighted tariff policy the nations of the earth who once traded with us freely are now closing their doors in our face and penalizing our people by levying high tariffs upon our exports. Will we not have to put the Golden Rule of "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you" in business as a part of our foreign-trade policy?

In conclusion, my friends, may I say the Democratic House of Representatives is doing all it can to help relieve the distressed situation that hangs over our country like a pall.

It is my intention to stay here on the job and do my part.

FIREMEN'S INSURANCE CO. OF WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN, D. C.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2958) to amend the charter of the Firemen's Insurance Co. of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, S. 2958, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Maryland explain what is really to be accomplished by this short bill amending the charter of the Firemen's Insurance Co.?

Mr. PALMISANO. Since the incorporation of the Firemen's Insurance Co. there has been general law passed permitting insurance companies to extend their lines of insurance. In order that the Firemen's Insurance Co. may enjoy the same rights the other insurance companies enjoy under the general laws of the District this amendment of their charter is necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why can they not obtain the same privilege under the general law instead of requiring a special enactment of Congress?

Mr. PALMISANO. They could except for the fact this fire insurance company happened to be chartered by Congress, and in order to amend its charter it must be done by act of Congress.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my objection to these matters is fundamental. I do not believe any corporation or company should be organized by act of Congress, and here is the best proof of the soundness of my objection. Instead of amending their charter in the usual way they must come to Congress for an amendment. How did this company originally happen to get a charter by act of Congress?

Mr. HOLMES. The original act under which this company was incorporated was the act of March 3, 1837.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why should not this company reorganize under the general law like any other corporation?

Mr. HOLMES. The general provisions of the law can not be made applicable to this company without the authority of Congress.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They might reorganize under the general law.

Mr. HOLMES. Then they would have to forego the material value of the advertising that comes to them by reason of being incorporated under an original act.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I suppose they feature the fact that they are the only company organized by act of Congress.

Mr. HOLMES. They can not do that because there are other companies organized under this same act.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is this a profit-making company?

Mr. HOLMES. It is a fire-insurance company.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A stock corporation?

Mr. HOLMES. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not even a mutual company.

Mr. HOLMES. It is a stock company.

Mr. PALMISANO. I may state to the gentleman from New York that as chairman of the subcommittee on the judiciary of the District of Columbia Committee I have maintained the position that where a corporation may be incorporated under the general laws we ought not to report any bill incorporating any company.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I compliment the gentleman on his policy, but I certainly take exception to the designation, by inference or otherwise, of any subcommittee of this House as the Committee on the Judiciary, except the real Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not want to obtain any rights I do not have, but the fact is the rules of the House designate this subcommittee in that way.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; they do not.

Mr. PALMISANO. Then I think it ought to be corrected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why does not this company secure its charter under the District of Columbia through the regular channels instead of coming to Congress where we have no supervision?

Mr. PALMISANO. Simply because they would have to reorganize another company and abandon the present company.

Mr. DYER. That is what they should do. It is a bad policy for a business concern of any kind to secure a charter from Congress, because Congress has no facilities for looking after such companies or seeing that they are properly conducted. They make reports to us, but who sees them? I think the thing to do is to put an end to all these charters and let us proceed in the regular way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mrs. NORTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill as a matter of right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the House Calendar and the lady from New Jersey can call it up as a matter of right. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the charter of The President and Directors of the Firemen's Insurance Co. of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, granted by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1837, extended by an act of Congress approved February 7, 1857, and amended by an act of Congress approved February 18, 1911, is hereby further amended to permit the said insurance company to insure and reinsure risks in all the various forms authorized by section 3 of an act of Congress approved March 4, 1922, entitled "An act to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

SEC. 2. That the said charter of the said The President and Directors of the Firemen's Insurance Co. of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, is hereby further amended so that the authorized capital stock of said company shall be $1,000,000, divided into 50,000 shares of the par value of $20 each.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire as to the limit of capitalization which an insurance company may have under the general law? You are increasing the capitalization of this insurance company from $200,000 to $1,000,000. What is the limit, in case a new corporation should be formed under the general law, as to the amount of its capitalization?

Mr. PALMISANO. I confess I do not know whether or not there is any limitation under the general law.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the purpose of this special act, it is to enlarge the powers of this privately chartered insurance company in order that it may undertake other forms of insurance under the general insurance laws of the District.

Mr. HOLMES. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not that the real purpose of increasing the capitalization from $200,000 to $1,000,000?

Mr. HOLMES. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask any member of the Committee on the District of Columbia this question: If a corporation is formed under the general provisions of the insurance laws of the District, whether there is any limit on the capital which that corporation may have?

Mr. HOLMES. Personally I am under the impression that there is no limit at all.

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not think there is any limit.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have recently had the case of the Acacia Insurance Co., which was originally organized as a private company to issue insurance to members of the Masonic fraternity. Then, during the administration of President Harding an attempt was made to increase the powers of that corporation. However, the bill providing such additional powers was vetoed by the President of the United States, on the ground that no company should be allowed to organize under an act of Congress which would feature the fact that it was connected with the Masonic fraternity. Then the company changed its name to Acacia, which, I understand, has a particular significance in Masonry, although I am not a member of that order or any other fraternal order. Then lately it came to Congress asking the privilege of issuing life insurance regardless of whether the persons insured were members of the Masonic fraternity or not. Now, I am asking the real purpose of this bill.

Mr. HOLMES. It is for the purpose of broadening the scope of this company.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under a congressional charter, so as to go out over the country and say they are chartered by the National Congress and enter into competition with private insurance companies the country over.

Mr. PALMISANO. The gentleman from Wisconsin ought to bear in mind that this insurance company already has a national charter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Only for a special limited form of insurance.

Mr. PALMISANO. That was true in 1837, under the general laws, but since that act was passed, on March 4, 1922, the general insurance laws were enlarged and this company, being chartered by Congress, was unable to derive any benefit from the act of 1922. Now it asks for the particular benefit which we have given to insurance companies in general under the act of 1922.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time is in the control of the lady from New Jersey.

Mr. DYER. Will the lady from New Jersey yield me two minutes?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the lady from New Jersey, the chairman of the District Committee, if the District of Columbia Committee brings in bills recommending that charters be granted by Congress or if this is the only instance where they have brought in something to change a charter that has already been granted.

Mrs. NORTON. I think we have brought in two such bills.

Mr. DYER. Then the District Committee does assume to have jurisdiction over the bringing in of bills to grant charters by Congress in the District.

Mrs. NORTON. The District Committee can do that, but this bill has not anything to do with that.

Mr. DYER. For many, many years it has been left with the Judiciary Committee to bring in bills granting charters by the Congress.

Mrs. NORTON. Is that true of the District?

Mr. DYER. Yes. We have recommended the granting of charters to citizens of the District, for instance, those engaged in patriotic work or some special work connected with the Government service. Then we have granted charters to veterans' organizations which have headquarters here.

Mrs. NORTON. May I say to the gentleman that this is limited to District business and these bills are referred to the judiciary subcommittee of the District Committee, of which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO] is the chairman.

Mr. DYER. But the gentlewoman from New Jersey can readily see, I am sure, how dangerous it is to grant charters to citizens of the District for the purpose of engaging in business when we have here in the District of Columbia every facility for the incorporation of all kinds of business, as we have in every State of the Union.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. HOLMES. I think I can safely say, although this is my first year of service on this committee, that it is the unanimous opinion of the members of the District Committee that we do not want to embark on any program that is going to mean the granting of special, congressional charters or national charters to any organization or individual, but this is an act for a company that has been granted a special charter.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HOLMES. This organization was chartered back in 1837 and its charter on several occasions has been modified and brought up to date.

Mr. DYER. I understand that, and I am not criticizing the legislation that the gentlewoman from New Jersey has brought in. I have no objection to it, and I want to compliment the very distinguished chairman of the District Committee for the fine work the committee has been doing. It has been doing this without any expectation of reward except a consciousness of having done its duty. I served many years ago on the District Committee, and I know what little thanks one gets for one's services upon that committee so far as our constituencies or the country at large or the membership of the House may be concerned. However, I invite the attention of the House to the fact that in years gone by we have granted charters promiscuously to this, that, and everything, which had no connection with, and no benefit to, the Government at all. Many of them have used their charter to go out and raise funds and to campaign for money and, in my judgment, to bring discredit upon the Government. We ought to be very careful in making such grants. Our Judiciary Committee and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate some years ago adopted a policy of refusing, except in exceptional cases, to recommend the granting of charters by the Congress.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. I think that has been the accepted policy of the District of Columbia Committee, and whether we pass on the bill or the Judiciary Committee passes on the bill is determined entirely by the reference of the bill by the Parliamentarian.

Mr. DYER. I think the committee will realize it is very important and that we ought to be very careful in taking action on matters of this nature.

Mrs. NORTON. May I thank the gentleman for his kind remarks regarding the Committee on the District of Columbia. We shall be careful about our actions in this regard.

Mr. PALMISANO. I am pleased that the gentleman from Missouri has made this statement on the floor, because while acting for the chairman of this subcommittee, I have been in conflict with a number of the Members of the House, because whenever they have called upon me to grant them a hearing on bills relating to charters, I have asked them, consistently, whether or not they could obtain the charter under the general laws; and unless they could tell me they could not, I would not consider the bill.

Mr. DYER. I commend the gentleman for his action.

Mr. KURTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield.

Mr. KURTZ. May I ask the gentleman if it is not the fact that an effort is being made to cancel or annul some of the charters indiscriminately granted by the Congress?

Mr. DYER. There is such an effort being made, but it is a very difficult matter. It is very hard to get rid of a charter after it has once been granted.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 8627) was laid on the table.

PROMOTION OF SAFETY ON STREETS AND HIGHWAYS BY PROVIDING FOR FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY OF OWNERS AND OPERATORS OF MOTOR VEHICLES

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7894) to promote safety on the streets and highways of the District of Columbia by providing for the financial responsibility of owners and operators of motor vehicles for damages caused by motor vehicles on the public highways in the District of Columbia, to prescribe penalties for the violation of the provisions of this act, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall in no respect be considered as a repeal of any of the provisions of the traffic acts for the District of Columbia but shall be construed as supplemental thereto.

SEC. 2. The motor-vehicle operator's or chauffeur's license and all of the registration certificates of any person who shall by a final order or judgment have been convicted of or shall have forfeited any bond or collateral given for a violation of any of the following provisions of law, to wit—

Driving while under the influence of intoxicating liquor or narcotic drugs, as provided in section 10 of the traffic acts of the District of Columbia;

Leaving the scene of an automobile accident in which personal injury occurs without making identity known, as provided in section 10 of said traffic acts;

Such other violations as constitute cause for suspension or revocation of licenses in the District of Columbia; or shall be suspended by the director of traffic (hereinafter called the director) because of such conviction and shall remain so suspended and shall not at any time thereafter be renewed, nor shall any other motor vehicle be thereafter registered in his name until he shall give proof of his ability to respond thereafter in damages resulting from the ownership or operation of a motor vehicle and arising by reason of personal injury to or death of any one person of at least $5,000, and, subject to the aforesaid limit for each person injured or killed, of at least $10,000 for such injury to or the death of two or more persons in any one accident, and for damage to property of at least $1,000 resulting from any one accident. Such proof in said amounts shall be furnished for each motor vehicle owned or registered by such person. If any such person shall fail to furnish said proof his operator's license and registration certificate shall remain suspended and shall not at any time thereafter be renewed, nor shall any other motor vehicle be thereafter registered in his name until such time as said proof be given. If such person shall not be a resident of the District of Columbia the privilege of operating any motor vehicle in the District of Columbia and the privilege of operation within the District of Columbia of any motor vehicle owned by him shall be withdrawn until he shall have furnished such proof: Provided, That in case of both residents and nonresidents, however, if it shall be duly established to the satisfaction of the director, and the director shall so find, (a) that any such person so convinced, or who shall have pled guilty or forfeited bond or collateral, was, upon the occasion of the violation upon which such conviction, plea, or forfeiture was based, a chauffeur or motor-vehicle operator, however designated, in the employ of the owner of such motor vehicle; or a member of the same family and household of the owner of such motor vehicle, and (b) that there was not, at the time of such violation, or subsequent thereto, up to the date of such finding, any motor vehicle registered in the District of Columbia in the name of such person convicted, entering a plea of guilty or forfeiting bond or collateral, as aforesaid, then in such event, if the person in whose name such motor vehicle is registered shall give proof of ability to respond in damages, in accordance with the provisions of this act (and the director shall accept such proof from such person), such chauffeur or other person, as aforesaid, shall thereupon be relieved of the necessity of giving such proof in his own behalf. It shall be the duty of the clerk of the court, or of the court where it has no clerk, in which any such judgment or order is rendered or other action taken to forward immediately to the director a certified copy or transcript thereof. A certified copy or transcript of the judgment, order, or record of other action of the court shall be prima facie evidence of such conviction therein stated.

A conviction of an offense in any other State, which if committed in the District of Columbia would be a violation of any of the aforesaid provisions of the traffic acts of the District of Columbia;

SEC. 3. The operator's license and all of the registration certificates of any person, in the event of his failure to satisfy every judgment arising from an accident, or accidents, happening subsequently to the effective date of this act and which shall have become final by expiration without appeal of the time within which appeal might have been perfected or by the final affirmance on appeal, rendered against him by a court of competent jurisdiction in the District of Columbia or any State, or in a district court of the United States, for damages on account of personal injury, or damages to property in excess of $100, resulting from the ownership or operation of a motor vehicle by him, his agent, or any other person with the express or implied consent of the owner, shall be forthwith suspended by the director, upon receiving a certified copy of such final judgment or judgments from the court in which the same are rendered and shall remain so suspended and shall not be renewed, nor shall any other motor vehicle be thereafter registered in his name while any such judgment remains unstayed, unsatisfied, and subsisting, and until the said person gives proof of his ability to respond in damages, as required in section 4 of this act, for future accidents. It shall be the duty of the clerk of the court in which any such judgment is rendered to forward immediately to such director a certified copy of such judgment or a transcript thereof. In the event the defendant is a nonresident, it shall be the duty of the director to transmit to the commissioner of motor vehicles (or officer in charge of the issuance of operators' permits and registration certificates) of the State of which the defendant is a resident a certified copy of said judgment. If after such proof has been given any other such judgment shall be recovered against such person for any accident occuring before such proof was furnished, and after the effective date of this act such license and certificates shall again be and remain suspended while any such judgment remains unsatisfied and subsisting: Provided, however, That (1) when $5,000 has been credited upon any judgment or judgments rendered in excess of that amount for personal injury to or the death of one person as the result of any one accident; (2) when, subject to the limit of $5,000 for each person, the sum of $10,000 has been credited upon any judgments rendered in excess of that amount for personal injury to or the death of more than one person as the result of any one accident; or (3) when $1,000 has been credited upon any judgment or judgments rendered in excess of that amount for damage to property as the result of any one accident resulting from the ownership or operation of a motor vehicle by such judgment debtor, his agent, or any other person, with his express or implied consent, then and in such event such payment or payments shall be deemed a satisfaction of such judgment or judgments for the purposes of this section only.

Whenever any motor vehicle, after the passage of this act, shall be operated upon the streets and highways of the District of Columbia by any person other than the owner, with the consent of the owner, express or implied, the operator thereof shall, in case of accident, be deemed to be the agent of the owner of such motor vehicle.

If any such motor-vehicle owner or operator shall not be a resident of the District of Columbia, the privilege of operating any motor vehicle in the District of Columbia and the privilege of operation within the District of Columbia of any motor vehicle owned by him shall be withdrawn, while any final judgment procured against him for damages, including personal injury or death caused by the operation of any motor vehicle, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, shall be unstayed, unsatisfied, and subsisting, and until he shall have given proof of his ability to respond in damages for future accidents as required in section 4 of this act.

In all cases of persons who have been tried and convicted or pled guilty of violations of traffic laws of the District of Columbia the operation by a nonresident or with his express or implied consent, if an owner of a motor vehicle, on any public street or highway of the District of Columbia, shall be deemed equivalent to an appointment by such nonresident of the director or his successor in office to be his true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served all lawful processes in any action or proceedings against him growing out of any accident or collision in which said nonresident may be involved while so operating or so permitting to be operated a motor vehicle on any such street or highway, and said operation shall be a signification of his agreement that any such process against him, which is so served, shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served upon him personally. Service of such process shall be made by leaving a copy of the process with a fee of $2 in the hands of the director, or in his office, and such service shall be sufficient service upon the said nonresident: Provided, That notice of such service and a copy of the process are forthwith sent by registered mail by the plaintiff, or his attorney, to the defendant, and the defendant's return receipt appended to the writ and entered with the declaration. The court in which the action is pending may order such continuances as may be necessary to afford the defendant a reasonable opportunity to defend the action.

SEC. 4. Proof of ability to respond in damages when required by this act may be evidenced by the written certificate or certificates of any insurance carrier, duly authorized to do business within the District of Columbia, or in the case of a nonresident, by an insurance carrier authorized to transact business in any of the several States, that it has issued to or for the benefit of the person named therein a motor-vehicle liability policy or policies as defined in this act which, at the date of said certificate or certificates, is in full force and effect and designating therein by explicit description or by other appropriate reference all motor vehicles with respect to which coverage is granted by the policy certified to. The director shall not accept any certificate or certificates unless the same shall cover all motor vehicles registered in the name of the person furnishing such proof. Additional certificates as aforesaid shall be required as a condition precedent to the registration of any additional motor vehicle or motor vehicles in the name of such person required to furnish proof as aforesaid. Said certificate or certificates shall certify that the motor-vehicle liability policy or policies therein cited shall not be canceled except upon 10 days' prior written notice thereof to the director.

Such proof may be the bond of a surety company duly authorized to do business within the District of Columbia or a bond with at least two individual sureties, each owning unencumbered real estate in the District of Columbia, approved by a judge of a court of record, which said bond shall be conditioned for the payment of the amounts specified in section 2 hereof and shall not be cancelable except after 10 days' written notice to the director. Such bond shall constitute a lien in favor of the District of Columbia upon the real estate of any surety, which lien shall exist in favor of any holder of any final judgment on account of damage to property over $100 in amount or injury to any person or persons caused by the operation of such person's motor vehicle, upon the filing of notice to that effect by the director in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Such proof of ability to respond in damages may also be evidence presented to the director of a deposit by such person with the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia of a sum of money or collateral, the amount of which money or collateral shall be $11,000. But the said clerk shall not accept a deposit of money or collateral where any judgment or judgments, theretofore recovered against person as a result of damages arising from the operation of any motor vehicle, shall not have been paid in full. The said clerk shall accept any such deposit and issue a receipt therefor.

The director shall be notified of the cancellation or expiration of any motor-vehicle liability policy of insurance certified under the provisions of this act at least 10 days before the effective date of such cancellation or expiration. In the absence of such notice of cancellation or expiration said policy of insurance shall remain in full force and effect. Additional evidence of ability to respond in damages shall be furnished the director at any time upon his demand.

SEC. 5. Such bond, money, or collateral shall be held by the said clerk to satisfy, in accordance with the provisions of this act, any execution issued against such person in any suit arising out of damage caused by the operation of any motor vehicle owned or operated by such person. Money or collateral so deposited shall not be subject to attachment or execution unless such attachment or execution shall arise out of a suit for damages, including injury to property, and personal injury or death, as a result of the operation of a motor vehicle. If a final judgment rendered against the principal on the surety or real-estate bond shall not be satisfied within 30 days after its rendition, the judgment creditor may, for his own use and benefit and at his sole expense, bring an action in the name of the District of Columbia against the company or persons executing such bond.

SEC. 6. The director shall, upon request, furnish any insurer, person, or surety a certified abstract of the operating record of any person subject to the provisions of this act, which abstract shall fully designate the motor vehicles, if any, registered in the name of such person, and if there shall be no record of any conviction of such person of a violation of any provision of any statute relating to the operation of a motor vehicle or of any injury or damage caused by such person as herein provided the director shall so certify. The director shall collect for each such certificate the sum of $1.

SEC. 7. The director shall furnish any person who may have been injured in person or property by any motor vehicle, upon written request, with all information of record in his office pertaining to the evidence of the ability of any operator or owner of any motor vehicle to respond in damages.

SEC. 8. Any operator or any owner whose operator's license or certificate of registration shall have been suspended as herein provided, or whose policy of insurance or surety bond shall have been canceled or terminated, or who shall neglect to furnish additional evidence of ability to respond in damages upon request of the director shall immediately return to the director his operator's license, certificate of registration, and the number plates issued thereunder. If any person shall fail to return to the director the operator's license, certificate of registration, and the number plates issued thereunder as provided herein, the director shall forthwith direct any member of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia to secure possession thereof and to return the same to the office of the director. Any person failing to return on demand such operator's license or such certificate and number plates shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not more than $100, and such penalty shall be in addition to any penalty imposed for any violation of the provisions of the traffic acts as given in section 2 of this act. The amount of such fine shall be paid in the manner provided for the payment of fines for violations of the traffic acts.

SEC. 9. The director may cancel such bond or return such evidence of insurance, or the said clerk may, with the consent of the director, return such money or collateral to the person furnishing the same, provided three years shall have elapsed since the filing of such evidence or the making of such deposit, during which period such person shall not have violated any provision of the traffic acts referred to in section 2, and provided no suit or judgment for damages on account of personal injury or damage to property in excess of $100 resulting from the operation of motor vehicle by him or his agent, shall then be outstanding against such person. The director may direct the return of any money or collateral to the person who furnished the same upon the acceptance and substitution of other evidence of his ability to respond in damages or, at any time after three years from the expiration of any registration or license issued to such person, provided no written notice shall have been filed with the director stating that such suit has been brought against such person by reason of the ownership, maintenance, or operation of a motor vehicle and upon the filing by such person with the director of an affidavit that he has abandoned his residence in the District of Columbia or that he has made a bona fide sale of any and all motor vehicles owned by him and does not intend to own or operate any motor vehicle in the District of Columbia for a period of one or more years.

SEC. 10. Any person who by any other law of the District of Columbia is required to make provision for the payment of loss occasioned by injury to or death of persons or damage to property shall, to the extent of such provision so made and not otherwise, be exempt from this act.

SEC. 11. Any person who shall forge or, without authority, sign any evidence of ability to respond in damages as required by the director in the administration of this act shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 or imprisoned not to exceed one year, or both.

SEC. 12. "Motor-vehicle liability policy," as used in this act, shall be taken to mean a policy of liability insurance issued to the person therein named as insured by an insurance carrier authorized to transact business in the District of Columbia, or in the case of a nonresident, by an insurance carrier authorized to transact business in any of the several States, which policy shall designate, by explicit description or by appropriate reference, all motor vehicles with respect to which coverage is intended to be granted by said policy, and shall insure the insured named therein and any other person using or responsible for the use of any such motor vehicle with the consent, express or implied, of such insured, against loss from the liability imposed upon such insured by law or upon such other person for injury to or death of any person, other than such person or persons as may be covered, as respects such injury or death by any workmen's compensation law, or damage to property except property of others in charge of the insured or the insured's employees growing out of the maintenance, use, or operation of any such motor vehicle in the United States of America; or which policy shall, in the alternative, insure the person therein named as insured against loss from the liability imposed by law upon such insured for injury to or death of any person, other than such person or persons as may be covered as respects such injury or death by any workmen's compensation law, or damage to property, except property of others in charge of the insured or the insured's employees, growing out of the operation or use by such insured of any motor vehicle, except a motor vehicle registered in the name of such insured, and occurring while such insured is personally in control, as driver or occupant, of such motor vehicle within the United States of America, to the amount or limit of $5,000, exclusive of interest and costs, on account of injury to or death of any one person, and, subject to the same limit as respects injury to or death of one person of $10,000, exclusive of interest and costs, on account of any one accident resulting in injury to or death of more than one person; and of $1,000 for damage to property of others, as herein provided, resulting from any one accident; or a binder pending the issuance of any such policy, or an indorsement to an existing policy as hereinafter provided: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as preventing such insurance carrier from granting any lawful coverage in excess of or in addition to the coverage herein provided for, nor from embodying in such policy any agreements, provisions, or stipulations not contrary to the provisions of this act and not otherwise contrary to law: Provided, however, That separate concurrent policies covering, respectively, (a) personal injury or death, as aforesaid, and (b) property damage, as aforesaid, shall be considered a motor-vehicle liability policy within the meaning of this act.

No motor-vehicle liability policy shall be issued or delivered in the District of Columbia until a copy of the form of policy shall have been on file with the superintendent of insurance for at least 30 days, unless sooner approved in writing by the superintendent of insurance, nor if within said period of 30 days the superintendent of insurance shall have notified the carrier in writing that in his opinion, specifying the reasons therefor, the form of policy does not comply with the laws of the District of Columbia. The superintendent of insurance shall approve any form of policy which discloses the name, address, and business of the insured, the coverage afforded by such policy, the premium charged therefor, the policy period, the limit of liability, and the agreement that the insurance thereunder is provided in accordance with the coverage defined in this section as respects personal injury and death, or property damage, or both, and is otherwise subject to all the provisions of the act.

Such motor-vehicle liability policy shall be subject to the following provisions, which need not be contained therein:

(a) The liability of any company under a motor-vehicle liability policy shall become absolute whenever loss or damage covered by said policy occurs, and the satisfaction by the insured of a final judgment for such loss or damage shall not be a condition precedent to the right or duty of the carrier to make payment on account of such loss or damage. No such policy shall be canceled or annulled as respects any loss or damage by any agreement between the carrier and the insured after the said insured has become responsible for such loss or damage, and any such cancellation or annulment shall be void. Upon the recovery of a final judgment against any person for any such loss or damage, if the judgment debtor was at the accrual of the cause of action insured against liability therefor under a motor-vehicle liability policy, the judgment creditor shall be entitled to have the insurance money applied to the satisfaction of the judgment. But the policy may provide that the insured, or any other person covered by the policy, shall reimburse the company for payments made on account of any accident, claim, or suit involving a breach of the terms, provisions, or conditions of the policy; and further, if the policy shall provide for limits in excess of the limits designated in this section, the insurance carrier may plead against such judgment creditor, with respect to the amount of such excess limits of liability, any defenses which it may be entitled to plead against the insured. Any such policy may further provide for the prorating of the insurance thereunder with other applicable valid and collectible insurance.

(b) The policy, the written application therefor (if any), and any rider or indorsement which shall not conflict with the provisions of this act shall constitute the entire contract between the parties.

(c) The insurance carrier shall, upon the request of the insured, deliver to the insured for filing, or at the request of the insured shall file direct, with the director of traffic an appropriate certificate as set forth in section 4 hereof.

(d) Any carrier authorized to issue motor-vehicle liability policies as provided for in this act may, pending the issue of such a policy, execute an agreement, to be known as a binder; or may, in lieu of such a policy, issue an indorsement to an existing policy, each of which shall be construed to provide indemnity or protection in like manner and to the same extent as such a policy. The provisions of this section shall apply to such binders and indorsements.

SEC. 13. The following words, as used in this act, shall have the following meanings:

(a) The singular shall include the plural. The masculine shall include the feminine and neuter, as requisite.

(b) "Persons" shall include individuals, partnerships, corporations, receivers, referees, trustees, executors, and administrators; and shall also include the owner of any motor vehicle as requisite, but shall not include the District of Columbia.

(c) "Motor vehicle" shall include trailers, motor cycles, and tractors.

SEC. 14. The director shall make rules and regulations necessary for the administration of this act.

SEC. 15. Nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the plaintiff in any action at law from relying for security upon the other processes provided by law.

SEC. 16. If any part, subdivision, or section of this act shall be deemed unconstitutional, the validity of its remaining provisions shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 17. This act shall go into effect 90 days after its passage and approval by the President of the United States.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the lady from New Jersey yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. Some of us are very much interested in this bill, and I have a copy of the report, but it only contains a few words. What is the purpose of the bill?

Mrs. NORTON. The purpose of the bill is to prevent carelessness of automobile drivers.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; that is stated in this report, what little there is of it.

Mrs. NORTON. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLEOD] introduced the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the lady from New Jersey yield to me?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill, I may say, passed the House at the last session. The gentleman from Alabama may recollect the instance, because he follows legislation rather closely. This bill is sponsored by the American Automobile Association. It seeks to give protection to the pedestrian and take away the license of reckless automobile drivers. It is a model law, and if adopted in the District, it is hoped that it will be put in force in the States. There are some cities and municipalities which have similar legislation. It does not permit a chauffeur, convicted of reckless driving, to retain his license, because he is a menace to society.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the bill has nothing more for its purpose, I am in hearty accord with it. I would like to ask if in any way it increases taxes?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I went over this bill carefully, section by section, when it was up for consideration before, and I am in hearty accord with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. I also have gone over the bill very carefully, but I wanted to be sure about the provisions.

Mr. McLEOD. Let me say that the purpose of the bill is that where you have an accident, and no attempt is made to take care of the party injured, the driver can not obtain a license to continue to operate an automobile until he takes out insurance and reimburses the individual. This bill does not provide for compulsory automobile insurance.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. As I read this bill, it provides that where a business concern is operating, say, 20 trucks, and carrying its own insurance, it would be compelled to take out insurance in case of an accident, notwithstanding the fact that it may make a more favorable settlement on account of a claim arising out of an accident than an insurance carried would.

Mrs. NORTON. No; the bill does not provide that.

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The bill requires insurance indemnity.

Mr. McLEOD. It requires no insurance until he has been found guilty by a competent court.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Suppose here is a concern, A, which has 20 trucks, and 1 of them meets with an accident involving damage of $8 or $10, perhaps for a broken fender. Until he secures a settlement you would not permit him to operate his other 19 trucks, even though to-morrow the claim would be all settled. If there was no question of negligence, there would be no liability, and yet you require insurance.

Mr. McLEOD. If the liability was on the part of the owner of the 20 trucks, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. You do not say "liability"; you say "trouble." When there is an accident the question arises as to who is guilty of negligence, and if there is negligence on the part of one he should make restitution. But here, simply because A has one truck in an accident, if he gets into trouble, he must pay an insurance premium, although he may settle any claim arising out of an accident the next day.

Mr. McLEOD. The statement I made in regard to trouble should be taken from the RECORD. I did not understand it the way the gentleman speaks. The party must be found guilty of a violation or misdemeanor.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Where and by whom? In a court where damages are claimed or in the police court?

Mr. McLEOD. In either court. If he be found guilty of a misdemeanor in the police court for the offense of a tort or negligence, then he would have to obtain insurance and make restitution before he would get another permit, and he would have to reimburse the party for damage. But there must be a finding of guilt before this is enforceable. It is not just a finding of a state of facts on your part or my part as between the two persons as to who is guilty. There must be an actual finding by a court.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. There are three or four insurance companies carrying automobile liability called mutual insurance companies. Frequently there is a difference of opinion between those who operate regular insurance companies and those who operate mutual insurance companies. It occurs to me, as I have examined the text of the bill, that you have entirely omitted the right of a mutual insurance company's policy to be recognized under this bill, notwithstanding that those companies may be otherwise recognized to do business in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McLEOD. Where does the gentleman find that?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. It is a matter of omission. It is not in the bill. You do not recognize the mutual liability insurance company.

Mr. PALMISANO. Oh, I think any insurance company, whether mutual or otherwise, that is recognized by the insurance commissioner of the District of Columbia will be recognized under this bill.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The gentleman says he thinks.

Mr. PALMISANO. There is no question about that.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Can the gentleman point me to any language in the bill that would cover a mutual insurance company. That is all I asked for.

Mr. McLEOD. There is no language in the bill that segregates or tries to define or discriminate against any insurance company that is a reputable company recognized by the Insurance Commission of the District of Columbia, regardless of whether it is mutual or otherwise.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Does the gentleman mean in section 4, which provides?—

> Proof of ability to respond in damages when required by this act may be evidenced by the written certificate or certificates of any insurance carrier, duly authorized to do business within the District of Columbia, or in the case of a nonresident, by an insurance carrier authorized to transact business in any of the several States.

Is it the gentleman's interpretation that those words "any insurance carrier duly authorized to do business within the District of Columbia, or in case of a nonresident, by an insurance carrier authorized to transact business in any of the several States," include these mutual companies?

Mr. McLEOD. That is correct, they do. If they are not fit, they can be ruled out.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I want that statement made on the floor, if that is a fact, and the intention.

Mr. McLEOD. That is a fact, and the intention.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, that about finishes the bills from the Committee on the District of Columbia for this session, and at this time may I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the various gentlemen who have occupied the chair in the House and in the Committee of the Whole, as well as every Member of the House, for their splendid cooperation with the Committee on the District of Columbia during this session. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. GLOVER, for an indefinite time, on account of sickness in family.

To Mrs. WINGO, indefinitely, on account of illness.

THE DOUBLE TAXATION BURDEN

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], a distinguished member of the Committee on Ways and Means, on July 6 last delivered a very interesting and able address over the radio, dealing with the question of double taxation. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing that address in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me yesterday to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the radio address by the Hon. FRED VINSON, of Kentucky, I now submit for the RECORD his very able and interesting address delivered over the radio on July 6, dealing with the problems of taxation.

No Member of either branch of the Congress has worked more assiduously to bring about the passage of legislation designed to correct the unprecedented conditions which now obtain in the country. Few men in public life understand so well as does FRED VINSON the intricate problems involved in revenue legislation. As a member of the great Committee on Ways and Means he has proven his worth to his country, and every Member of the House of Representatives not only recognizes his outstanding ability but respects his sound judgment upon national affairs. On both sides of the aisle he is regarded as a most valuable Member of the Congress. With his broad vision, his clear conception of national problems, his devotion to duty, Congressman VINSON has made a record of which his district and his party is justly proud. I deem it a privilege to present for the RECORD the following address:

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. FRED M. VINSON, OF KENTUCKY, JULY 6, 1932

The tax burden of our country presents a most difficult problem. Its importance is second to none. Birth, taxes, and death are the succession of events in our terrestrial sojourn. Under our form of government, every division thereof, Federal, State, and municipal, imposes burden upon the property, income, and energy of its citizens. Proper emphasis, in recent months, has been laid upon the Federal burden. But taxes imposed by the States and their several subdivisions, county, city, and other taxing divisions, truly constitutes the major burden. The overlapping and duplication of taxes by our various governmental units are ever increasing the tax load of our people.

The annual expenditure for government in this country reaches thirteen and one-half billions of dollars. We have property taxes (tangible and intangible), income taxes (individual and corporate), franchise taxes, excise taxes, sales taxes, inheritance taxes, estate taxes, customs, per capita (poll) taxes, local assessments, and many other tax impositions.

Nineteen States have individual income taxes; 19 States have corporate income taxes; 13 States levy tobacco taxes; 47 of the States have inheritance taxes; all States have real property taxes; all these sources are subject to Federal taxation. Many items are subject to excise taxes by the municipal, State, and Federal Government. One business concern pays 198 separate taxes in 33 different forms in 33 States, ranging from 1 tax to 13 taxes to a State. With one-fifth of our annual income used up in the expense of Government, we are presented with a complicated maze. The burden of taxation is magnified many times over because of the high oversized value of the dollar and the prevailing low commodity prices.

THE COMMITTEE AND ITS PURPOSE

In an effort to relieve against this ever-increasing burden, I introduced a House resolution for the appointment of a committee, authorized and directed to—

"make an investigation and study of the overlapping, duplication, and lack of correlation, in the imposition of taxes by the United States and the States, the legal and constitutional limitations on the taxing powers of the United States and the States giving rise to maladjustments of Federal and State taxation, methods of attaining coordination in the administration of the tax laws of the United States and the several States, and all problems which, in its opinion, arise in connection with the relations of the States and the United States with respect to taxation. The committee shall report to the House, on or before December 15, 1932, the results of its investigation, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable."

The following Members of the House were assigned to this task: Messrs. THOMAS H. CULLEN (New York), DAVID J. LEWIS (Maryland), CARL R. CHINDBLOM (Illinois), FRANK CROWTHER (New York), and myself as chairman. This is the initial step to coordinate and correlate the taxes imposed by the States and United States. It is high time for concerted effort to determine their respective fields of taxation and to eliminate, as far as possible, the injustices to the American people, required by law to be assumed. For, as the illustrious Marshall—in an early day—said, "The power to tax is the power to destroy."

BALANCING THE BUDGET

As an original proposition, I differed with the Treasury's position that it was imperative to balance the Budget in a single year. With full knowledge of the deficit for 1931 and 1932, totaling almost four billions of dollars—the administration took no steps toward balancing the Budget until last December, and then insisted that the ends must meet July 1, 1933. Some of us thought that it would be more businesslike, and certainly less burdensome to an already heavily laden tax-paying public, to bring the receipts and expenditures together over a 2-year spread. In this manner, we could have fuller benefits from reductions in appropriations, elimination of useless offices, consolidation of kindred functioning, reductions in expenditures, and economies in administration. Further, the full benefits of the new taxes can not be secured until the second fiscal year, in view of the fact that only the collections in March and June, 1933, of income taxes for the calendar year 1932, will be collected in the next fiscal year.

However, so insistent was the Treasury upon the 1-year program, which position it sold to the country, that those of us who had originally entertained the idea of the 2-year spread made concession of our position.

REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES

Federal appropriations are based upon the estimates of the Director of the Budget, who speaks for the President of the United States. For the next fiscal year, the presidential recommendations of last December total $4,100,000,000. Thousands of specific items make up that stupendous total. Not long since, the President, without signifying the items to be affected, called for a cut of $700,000,000. Why were the appropriations recommended in this dark, economic hour if any of the items were unnecessary.

Congress, this session, has established an all-time record for economy. Without specific recommendations for savings, either from the President or the department heads, and in the face of actual opposition by certain department heads, this Congress has made reductions of more than $300,000,000 below the presidential estimates—$162,000,000 in expenditure cuts by the Appropriation Committee, the House and the Senate, and more than $150,000,000 through the Special Economy Committee, the House and Senate. The President, after the reduction of fixed charges, has fixed the base for reduced expenditures at $1,700,000,000. The reduction in expenditures therefore approximates 20 per cent of the aforesaid base.

Much larger reductions could have been made if the spending end of the Government, the executive branch, had cooperated in full degree. With further study of proposed amendments to existing law, many more hundreds of millions of dollars per year will be saved the taxpayers of this Nation.

I stated that the executive branch failed to cooperate in this economy program. For illustration, the consolidation of the Navy Department with the War Department under one Cabinet officer heading the Department of National Defense, was recommended by the Economy Committee. The estimated saving was $100,000,000 per year. Neither department approved. A former Member of the House, the liaison officer of the President, his present secretary, was on the floor of the House during its consideration. One hundred and fifty-two of the administration forces voted against this economy—50 for it. In my opinion, its defeat is directly attributable to the President of the United States.

THE TYRANNY OF EXCESSIVE TAXATION

The present tax burden is oppressive. With reductions in expenditures and the return of normal yield, many taxes may be eliminated and reductions in others effected. It is particularly opportune to initiate the effort to wipe out or at least relieve against the double taxation burden.

At the present time our taxes are collected without any definite jurisdictional lines. City, county, State, and Nation will tax anything that will yield returns. It is a permitted right in law, but an unjust exercise in application. Unless a definite policy be determined, every revenue field will be completely covered by both State and Federal Government. Their respective provinces must be determined and agreed upon. The tax load must be lightened. "The power to tax is the power to destroy."

For concrete illustration, since the early days of our Nation, a Federal tobacco tax has been levied. Twenty cigarettes are taxed 6 cents. Recently, 13 States have invaded this tax field. In Arkansas, 20 cigarettes are taxed 5 cents. So, a pack of cigarettes which retails for 10 cents in States not having a local tobacco tax, is sold in Arkansas for 15 cents, 11 cents of which is taxes. Four cents is the amount distributed among the tenant farmer, the farm owner, the selling warehouseman, the manufacturer, jobber, and retailer, including all transportation, distributing, and other costs. In other words, the tax is 275 per cent of the sale price of the commodity without imposition of tax. Based upon the average 1931–32 prices of Burley in Kentucky, which was 8⅔ cents per pound, the tobacco tax in Arkansas on a pack of 20 cigarettes is 2,100 per cent more than the average price the farmer received for its tobacco content. Not only is it destructive to the tobacco grower, but the saturation point has been reached and the law of diminishing return applies. Thus, the tax yield itself falls of its own weight. "The power to tax is the power to destroy."

Time limit prevents my dealing in detail with the percentage of burden imposed upon other commodities, industries, and tax subjects.

The States are not the only offenders in the invasion of the tax fields preempted by other branches of the Government. In the recent revenue bill, for the first time, the Federal Government invaded the gasoline field, which had heretofore been subject to State taxation only. This invasion was made because of the attractiveness and certainty of yield—which is far from justification of the act. Now the Federal Government imposes a tax of 1 cent a gallon on gasoline. In at least two States gasoline pays 7 cents per gallon in taxes. This total tax substantially equals the wholesale price of said commodity without tax. We turn to the sage of Monticello, who said:

"The government which steps out of the ranks of the ordinary articles of consumption to select and lay under disproportionate burdens a particular one, because it is a comfort, pleasing to the taste, or necessary to health, and will therefore be bought, is in that particular a tyranny."

TO LESSEN THE BURDEN

Under the direction or our appointment, our committee proposes to investigate and study the overlapping, duplication, and lack of correlation in the imposition of taxes by the United States and the States. We purpose to study and investigate the maladjustments now existing, together with the methods of attaining coordination in the administration of our tax laws. We purpose to study the foreign method of handling this problem. So that when tax burdens shall be reduced there may be a withdrawal by one form of government or the other from the fields in which they do not properly belong.

Our function is to lessen the burden of taxation. In no sense are we seeking new taxes. We will contact the States in the Union, their governors, taxing authorities, and tax experts, to ascertain the tax facts and their views and suggestions in approaching the remedy. We will call upon and use the experts in the Treasury Department and will rely heavily on the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, headed by Mr. L. H. Parker, chief of staff. In other words, we must first ascertain the facts; (2) reach a conclusion as to method; (3) wage the battle to effectuate this reform relief.

Several methods have already been suggested to relieve this confusion in taxes. However, we feel that a conclusion in this respect must be delayed until and after the study, investigation, and hearings are made. It is our intention to approach the matter impartially, unbiased, and with patriotic purpose. We will be happy to receive suggestions looking toward the end necessary to be retained.

ADDRESS OF HON. THOMAS R. AMLIE, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. AMLIE] may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an address delivered by him on July 7, 1932, at Cooperstown, N. Dak., commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of Griggs County, in the State of North Dakota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address of myself, Representative in Congress from the first district of Wisconsin, delivered at Cooperstown, Griggs County, N. Dak., on July 7, 1932, at the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of Griggs County:

Old settlers, neighbors, and friends, when I accepted the invitation of your chairman to come here and speak several months ago it was with certain reservations. Those reservations were death, sickness nigh unto death, or Congress being in session. But, despite the fact that Congress is still in session, I felt that I should come here and be with you on this the fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of Griggs County and this part of North Dakota. My father was one of the original settlers here, and it was here that I was born, and it is with these surroundings that I have the most pleasant memories of early life.

But despite the pleasure that I feel in being able to be with you on this celebration of your fiftieth anniversary, I confess that it is a pleasure mixed with much sadness. When I left North Dakota in 1918 it was a prosperous State. The farmers were all doing well. The people that I knew best were comparatively well to do. There was about everything an atmosphere of genuine progress and great accomplishment. There was a confidence that North Dakota had only begun to come into its own, and that the Northwest was entering upon an era of untold prosperity and good fortune.

But as I come back after an absence of 14 years all of this has been completely changed. The little towns and villages that I knew as a boy are not the prosperous villages of 14 years ago. They are largely deserted and gone to ruin. The farmers have nearly all lost their farms. The people who were prosperous, the farmers and business men of 14 years ago, are in the main poverty stricken to-day. A great many of them have been forced through bankruptcy. The people who as a boy I used to regard in the same light that I now regard Rockefeller, Ford, or Mellon I now find dispossessed of their fortunes. In short, where the people of this State were comparatively well to do only a few years ago, they are now totally impoverished. I have learned that no less than 47,000 of the citizens of North Dakota during the past winter have been actually dependent on the Red Cross for the bare necessities of life.

The thing which we have seen happen here has been without a parallel in the history of the country. I can well understand that those of you who have lived through this hardship during the past 12 years might well wish to have no mention made of it on this festive occasion. But it is this situation that I can not shake from my mind. In fact, it is the reason that led me to accept your invitation to come here to-day, for I feel that aside from reasons of sentiment it is not only your problem but my problem as well. It is the problem of the country as a whole.

The explanation of this problem is to be found in the fact that the Northwest has been a mere pawn in a larger political and economic war that has been waged for the past 100 years, but which now has apparently run its course.

To begin at the beginning, in so far as North Dakota is concerned, it is necessary to go back to the first Republican National Convention, held in Chicago, in 1860, the convention at which Lincoln was nominated. At that time the farmers of Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, and the Eastern States were anxious to secure free western land into which they might migrate. They were anxious for the passage of a homestead law whereby they might secure this land in return for moving west and making their homes upon it. But even in that day the eastern industrialists held the balance of power. They did not propose to give this land to the settlers without at the same time acquiring some benefit for themselves.

In the first place, the frontier was in competition with their industrial plants for labor. If a laboring man was not paid as much for his work in the factories as he could earn by going west and taking up a homestead and setting himself up as a farmer, he would naturally make a change. To make the frontier available to the laboring man and to be forced to compete with the frontier for labor was something that industrialists did not propose to do without adequate reward. They, therefore, demanded a protective-tariff policy for industry in exchange for their consent to the enactment of the homestead law. Not because they owned this western land but because they were able to dictate terms by reason of numerical superiority.

It will, therefore, be seen that the western land was really not given to the settlers as they supposed but that it was divided up between the settlers and the industrialists of the country. This was accomplished by an arrangement which compelled the farmers to sell their products in a world market and to buy everything that they might need in a protected home market. The homesteaders, therefore, found themselves taken in on a deal which they never fully understood. It was a deal whereby they did all the work and assumed all responsibility for the operation of their farms. The homesteaders were not owners. They were merely crop renters. They took part of the crop for raising it, and the other part they gave to the industrial East by virtue of their political agreement as embodied in the Republican platform of 1860.

At first this arrangement was not so onerous. The tariffs were not so high to start with. The fertility of the soil had not been mined and, besides, there was a large and profitable market for our agricultural products in the markets of Europe. Europe was well able to pay us for the products of our farms because we were owing Europe great sums of money. And be it said to the credit of the European nations of the nineteenth century, they fully understood that we could only pay our obligations to them by paying them in kind—by the exportation of American products to those creditor nations. The reason that we were then a debtor nation heavily indebted to the European nations, and particularly to England, was because of the fact that those nations had furnished us with a large part of our working capital.

As I have stated, it was necessary that we sell much more in Europe than we bought there, if we were to meet our foreign obligations; in short, that we maintain a favorable balance of trade.

But since the war all of this has been completely changed. What started out as a low protective tariff has become an exorbitantly high protective tariff. The Underwood tariff schedules of 1913, providing an average rate of 26.97 per cent, was raised to an ad valorem rate of 28.22 per cent under the Fordney-McCumber law, and this in turn was raised to approximately 45 per cent under the Smoot-Hawley law. During all of this time the farmer's European market has been becoming constantly weaker. As a result, therefore, he has been caught between the upper and the nether millstone.

The price that he has been receiving has been becoming progressively less and the price that he has had to pay because of this increase in tariff protection has been going steadily upward.

A tariff on imports was not so serious in an earlier day before the fertility of the soil had been depleted. But the fertility of this soil is now gone. You pioneers have spent a lifetime digging that fertility out of the soil and donating it to the industrial East.

As I have driven through the country the past two days I have been tremendously impressed with the great increase in foul and noxious weeds that has taken place during the last 16 years, a natural result of unprofitable farming conditions.

I have mentioned the fact that European nations are no longer able to pay for our agricultural products the prices that they paid in the years before the World War. There is a direct connection between this situation and our high protective tariff policy. When you pioneers came here this country was the great debtor nation of the world. We were owing for the investments of capital that had been made here by the citizens of foreign countries. It was through this capital that we secured our industrial development.

But that is now changed. We are no longer a debtor nation. We are now the great creditor nation of the world. We have invested abroad publicly and privately a sum of nearly $30,000,000,000. If foreign nations and their citizens were to pay merely the interest on this sum and keep their obligations alive, it would mean that they would have to sell at least a billion and a half dollars more of goods in the United States than they bought here. In other words, we can now afford to buy more than we sell.

But the mercantilists of this country believe that in spite of this fact it is possible to have a favorable balance of trade if we only raise the tariff walls high enough. The result of this is that foreign nations and their citizens are compelled to sell several times as much goods here as they otherwise would be compelled to sell, in order to pay their obligations to us.

The inevitable result is that through this high-tariff policy we are able to force the commodity prices of the world to unheard-of low levels. This is because they have contractual obligations here that they are going to try to meet if it is humanly possible to do so. In Congress these countries are criticized for dumping goods upon our shores. It is natural and proper that they should. Those countries will make every effort to meet their contractual obligations, because capitalism there as well as here is founded upon the sanctity of contract and the necessity of meeting such contractual obligations.

But these mercantilists overlook the fact that we are in competition with the world and that if we force world prices down we must of necessity force our own prices down. We must of necessity force the price of wheat, cotton, and other agricultural products, that are on an export basis, down to the world price levels. This is the thing that you farmers have felt for the last 12 years. Only a part of your high-protein wheat receives any protection under our tariff laws. Over 90 per cent of the total wheat crop of the United States receives no protection from the tariff whatsoever. The same thing is true to an even greater extent of cotton.

In 1926 Senator Oscar W. Underwood, who was perhaps the country's foremost authority on the tariff, declared that—

"Unless the excessive Fordney-McCumber rates are revised downward to reasonable competitive figures, the American people can have no right to expect European nations to pay their war debts. There must be revision of the rates downward or this country and the world will face distress and disaster. We can not go on lending money to European nations to permit them to buy our goods. We have reached the crest of the wave in those loans. There must be an end to them; and in place of a flow of American money to Europe in the form of loans there must be a circulation of goods and services between the United States and the European debtors. For purely selfish reasons the United States should be interested in the prosperity of Europe. We must exchange goods with the European nations if they are to get rid of their crushing money debts."

But the amazing feature about this sordid exploitation of one part of the country for the benefit of another has been the fact that the leaders in carrying out this policy of exploitation have been the Congressmen and Senators from the Northwest. The spectacle of these westerners vying with each other in carrying water for the Grand Old Party elephant and a high protective tariff will go down as one of the strange manifestations of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Quite likely anthropologists at some future date will seek to disinter the bones of some of these western representatives in the belief that an examination of their skulls might shed some light on this strange historic enigma. I am not talking about you people of North Dakota so much. At least you vindicated your common sense at the polls last week in the splendid vote that you gave to Senator NYE and Representative SINCLAIR. But I am talking about some of the other wheat States who keep sending to Washington representatives who represent the industrial East and betray their own States—States that have been doing this for 50 years and are still doing it.

I confess that this is a matter on which I feel very keenly. I have lived here in this county most of my life. I have been in close touch with this part of the country ever since I moved away. It was here that my father spent over 40 years digging the fertility out of the soil under an inhospitable clime for the benefit of an unappreciative industrial East.

And now that through this process of exploitation this part of the country has been stripped of all its wealth, now that the people have been reduced to abject poverty, now that conditions have become so bad that last winter 47,000 citizens of this great State were compelled to call upon the American Red Cross for the bare necessities of life, now that these things have come to pass and it becomes necessary to ask the Federal Government for aid for the people who are in dire distress, I have heard the scholarly JAMES M. BECK, of Pennsylvania, and CHARLES L. GIFFORD, of Massachusetts, ask with fine scorn—"What, tax the rich industrial States of the East in order to feed your paupers of the West! Let those States feed their own beggars."

I confess that when I heard expressed on the floors of Congress this attitude of the industrial East that I have been filled with a sense of degradation and shame. To think that you pioneers have spent 50 years digging the fertility out of this soil and donating it to the industrial East, and then in your hour of extremity to be met with this taunt.

But I am willing to let bygones be bygones. You came here 50 years ago empty handed. Out of this soil you dug a measure of competence. During the last 12 years of exploitation it has all been taken away from you. Even the improvements that you have put up do not begin to equal in value the fertility that you have mined out of this soil, and that now is gone and gone forever. You are back where you started 50 years ago—empty handed.

If there is one thing that fills my heart with rage as I travel through the great Eastern States, it is to see erected in the places of honor monuments to the memory of some third or fourth rate Revolutionary hero. Those people believe that their greatness is due to the exploits of these so-called heroes. I confess that I should like to see them all smashed to smithereens or perhaps, in deference to local sentiment, wrapped up and buried out of sight; and in their places I should like to see erected monuments to the northwestern wheat farmers, to the southern cotton farmers, to the midwestern hog farmers, or to the independent manufacturers who have held their own in the markets of the world without any subsidy or special protection. It is to these men that America owes its greatness.

The real tragedy of the past three years has been the total inability of the people who are in the seats of power to understand this obvious and elementary fact. I will explain what I mean.

Since this depression began our national policy has been formulated upon the supposition that we could safely follow the same course in dealing with this depression that we have followed in dealing with the depressions of the past.

In a hearing before a subcommittee of the House, of which I am a member, Mr. Silas Strawn, president of the American Chamber of Commerce, said in reply to my questioning:

"We have had 17 major depressions during the past 120 years. We got out of those depressions all right, and we are going to get out of this depression if we only keep cool and keep our courage up."

This statement is a full and complete statement of the guiding philosophy of our present national policies. If conditions are the same in this depression as they were in past depressions, then this may be a safe course to follow. But if conditions have materially changed, then such a course is fraught with danger and destruction.

In my opinion the people of the industrial East who rule this country do not understand the full significance of the Northwest and the rôle that it has played in past periods of depression. In the panics of '73 and '93 it was the agricultural Northwest that pulled us out. During those periods the farmers were able to pay their debts and to accumulate a surplus with which to start buying. The agricultural Northwest also furnished an outlet for the men who were thrown out of employment by industry. These men could take up homesteads and start raising agricultural products to sell in the markets of Europe and thereby rehabilitate their purchasing power.

I have often heard my father tell about the Cleveland panic in the nineties, how he was compelled to sell wheat for 36 cents a bushel. This was the worst period that my father saw during his 40 years of farming here in Griggs County. But where he received 36 cents a bushel, last fall I received 29 cents a bushel for wheat raised on the old farm. Where he received 20 bushels to the acre I received only 5, because the fertility of the soil is gone. Where he paid 4 cents a bushel for threshing, it now costs more than twice that amount. Where he paid $15 for taxes, the taxes are now five times that amount. In short, the worst years that my father ever saw during the Cleveland panic were better times than I have ever seen on this old farm during the past 10 years.

But the people of the East do not realize all this. They think that we got out of past depressions by the intelligent management of the captains of finance and industry or by the intelligent management of the National Government in Washington. They do not realize that we pulled out of those depressions in spite of the ineptitude and incompetence of the industrial leaders of the East and in spite of the bungling of the affairs of state.

They do not realize that it was agriculture, particularly in the Northwest, that pulled us out of those depressions of the past. They do not realize that the old horse "agriculture" is not able to pull us out of this one, that the old horse is sick nigh unto death, and that if we sit and wait for agriculture to pull us out of this depression, as it has pulled us out of the depressions in the past, then we will merely wait for inevitable and irretrievable disaster. It is this thing that the industrial and political leaders of the country can not comprehend.

During the past two and a half years, President Hoover, Julius Klein, and Secretary of Commerce Lamont have been sitting and looking at pictures of black lines—black lines moving up and then moving down. They are graphs showing the trends of commodity prices during past depressions. They imagine that this depression is going to run the same course that 17 other depressions have run during the past 120 years. They can not understand that the natural corrective forces that were present in past depressions are no longer operative. The frontier is gone. Agriculture can no longer carry the load. Under the handicaps that have been placed upon it, agriculture can no longer carry itself. People are not finding jobs on the land. We now have 11,000,000 unemployed and the number is fast growing. Next winter there will be from twelve to fifteen million unemployed.

We have at last come to the point where we must recognize the fundamental and inherent weakness of the profit system. We must take the measures necessary to overcome these inherent weaknesses, or else these weaknesses may readily become the means of destroying our whole economic structure.

During the past 25 years we have found an escape from these threatening periods of depression through a number of industrial outlets—the building of roads, the building of our industrial machine, the automobile industry, foreign expansion, foreign loans, and the World War. But apparently an outlet for expansion along these lines is no longer available, and despite all of these things we are still proceeding on the theory that the system has within itself the cure for this situation, when such is obviously not the case. We are following a policy of laissez faire simply because such a policy has worked in the past, even though all the attendant circumstances were different in past periods of depression.

As time goes on it becomes increasingly obvious that following out a laissez faire policy to its logical conclusion can only lead to untold misery on the part of the people. In fact, there is strong reason to believe that the misery engendered by such a process may become so great that it will lead to an explosion.

Whether we like it or not we have been forced into the situation where we must meet these inherent weaknesses squarely and deal with them frankly. Nothing can save us except clear thinking and courageous action. And, unfortunately, neither seems likely of immediate attainment on the political horizon.

But regardless of what the future may hold in store it seems to me that the burden from now on will fall with increasing force upon the industrial sections of the country. Relatively the agricultural Northwest will feel this blow less than any other section of the country. You are far removed from it all. At least you will be assured of enough to eat. But the time will come again when we must start to rebuild. When we must proceed to follow out some definite and logical policy. When that time comes it seems to me that the agricultural Northwest will be in a position to demand sectional equality and justice. The fallacy of our present arrangement has been completely demonstrated.

Either we must go ahead on a policy of trade and commerce that will permit of no restrictions being placed in the way of trade or else we must isolate ourselves from the rest of the world and work out a self-contained national economy. We are to-day groping in a wilderness of confused ideas in so far as agriculture is concerned.

We are doing many things to encourage production and increase the surplus which must be sold in foreign markets, and at the same time we are following a tariff policy that is completely destroying our foreign markets. This becomes particularly ruinous when we bear in mind that in any crop having an exportable surplus it is the price that is paid for this exportable surplus that fixes the price paid for the whole crop in the absence of legislation that would apply the tariff backward to that portion of the whole crop consumed at home.

We are following out a line of thought that was sound at a time when we were a debtor nation, and when our tariff policy did not stand in the way of preventing some reasonable compensation to the farmers of the Northwest for their crops.

Now, however, we are following a policy that destroys purchasing power abroad, and at the same time we seek to encourage the production of crops which are on an export basis, the surplus of which must of necessity be sold abroad.

We spend money to eradicate the Japanese barberry, but in view of the fact that we are destroying our foreign markets we might better be spending money to plant a patch of Japanese barberry at the corner of every wheat field.

We are spending money to destroy the boll weevil, but in view of the fact that we are following a policy that destroys our foreign markets it would be more consistent if we spent money to place the boll weevil in every cotton field.

We are spending money to increase our production of corn and hogs, and at the same time we are following a policy that destroys our foreign markets for our surplus production of hogs. We would be more consistent if we spent money placing the corn borer in every cornfield.

But ridiculous as it would be to spend money for such purposes it would at least be consistent with our economic policy in so far as it affects trade and world commerce.

But I do not believe that anyone will ever seriously advocate policies such as these merely to keep our national economic policies consistent. I believe the time has come when we can and will follow out an agricultural policy consistent with our national economic life.

If we are to try to maintain prices in the United States high in terms of gold by means of tariff walls, then we must find a means of increasing the prices paid to the producers of cotton, wheat, tobacco, and hogs—crops which are normally on an export basis.

This could be readily accomplished by levying a tax upon that portion of the crop that is processed and used at home; this tax to be the equivalent of the general tariff protection given to the other industries and the sum raised by means of such an excise tax to be distributed to the various States and counties in proportion to the normal crops produced in such areas over a given period of time.

Such a plan could be administered locally in so far as the distribution of the proceeds of such an excise tax is concerned. It would not be open to the objection that it would increase the bureaucratic tendency of our National Government. At the same time, it would not be necessary to appropriate money out of the United States Treasury. And what is far more important, it would place no inducement upon the raising of an unexportable and unsalable surplus.

In my opinion, if this method were tried out with the three or four crops which are on an export basis and are receiving no protection from our protective tariff policy, it would result in lifting all of agriculture to a basis of equality with other industry.

But I am not going to go into the details of the mechanics of such a plan. I am only going to state that, in my opinion, it is perfectly possible to give to the agricultural sections of the country full equality with the industry of the land; either by taking away from all industry special privilege and protection of every kind, or if, on the other hand, we are determined to follow out a self-contained national economic policy, then to give to agriculture that is on an export basis the same protection that is afforded other industries by means of a protective tariff.

Despite the fact that the process of exploiting one part of the country for the benefit of another has run its natural course, and you people now find yourselves back where you started 50 years ago, I still have confidence in the future of the great Northwest. I believe that we will again start to build on a basis that will assure this part of the country equality with every other part of the country and that we are soon to enter upon a period of prosperity and good fortune such as the Northwest has never enjoyed at any time in the past.

THE MOUNTING COST OF GOVERNMENT—WHERE THE MONEY GOES—A BRIEF STUDY IN FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States have become tax conscious. One of the direct effects of the depression has been to arouse thoughful America to call a halt upon mounting budgets and to checkmate the tendency that for 20 years has existed upon the part of local communities and groups and minority organizations to press upon Congress, upon State legislatures, and upon municipal units demands for greater and still greater expenditures of money.

For 20 years the people of the United States, individually and through their governmental agencies, have been expending money as though no day of reckoning were ahead. They have been incurring obligations as though they had discovered a type of bank upon which they could draw checks at will in almost any amount, and which, until a recent date, always had been honored. Suddenly the banker has turned upon them, and over his glasses has uttered that most ungracious reminder, "Pardon me, your account is overdrawn."

ACCOUNT IS OVERDRAWN

This is true of Nation, of State, of county, of city, and other municipalities. It is true of educational institutions, whether financed by public or by private endowments; it is true of many individuals and of business enterprises. Cities in some instances are deferring for weeks or months the payment of employees; many others have defaulted on principal or interest on bonded indebtedness. States are exceeding their budgets. The Federal Government was in the red at the end of the fiscal year which closed June 30, 1931, in the amount of $903,000,000. Upon June 30 last (1932) expenditures for the year just closed exceeded all national income by $2,885,000,000 (Treasury estimate, July 6, 1932).

The phenomenon of mounting expenditures does not belong to the Federal Government alone. In 1891 Federal, State, and county expenditures aggregated $1,233,000,000; in 1913 they aggregated $2,900,000,000; in 1922, $8,280,000,000; and in 1931, $13,000,000,000. Consider another factor; the total indebtedness of the United States in 1891 was $2,000,000,000; in 1913, $1,050,000,000; in 1922, $22,964,079,000; on April 30, 1932, $18,487,061,148.28.

The increase to which I have directed attention has relation in part to normal expanse of government, since population during 40 years has nearly doubled. Chiefly, however, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, it has been brought about by two factors—the burden of war which has left a national indebtedness of astounding proportions calling for annual appropriations toward reduction of principal and interest, and veteran obligations which call for enormous increase in governmental expenditures for veterans and their dependents.

DEMANDS FOR REDUCTION

Members of the Appropriations Committee are receiving most earnest demands for reduction of our annual Budgets. The demands are from the most responsible business men of the several States and they are extreme. One correspondent writes, "We are simply being taxed to death"; another one says, "Reduce the appropriations at least 25 per cent"; another one advises, "The only way to get expenses down is to cut them to bone; appropriations ought to be cut one-half." Still another writes, "Get your appropriations down; get them down to where they were before the World War."

Now, for a moment, let us undertake to translate these demands into money. Before the World War the expenses of our Federal Government were little more than $1,000,000,000 per year. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, the expenses of Government were $5,006,000,000—Treasury estimates, July 6, 1932.

The first demand calls for a reduction of one-fourth; that would mean a reduction of $1,250,000,000. The second demand calls for a reduction of one-half; that would mean $2,503,000,000. The third demand calls for pre-war expenditures only; that would mean a four-fifths reduction, or a reduction of $4,000,000,000.

Before considering the elements that make up the appropriation bills for the National Government I have purposely directed your attention to certain factors that we must not overlook. Again, the years that I shall use in studying the growth of expenditures are 1891, when we appropriated a half-billion dollars to meet all Federal expenses for one year; 1913, when we may be said "to have arrived" because we required an annual expenditure of $1,000,000,000; and the years 1922 and 1931, as two typical years following the World War.

I have used two typical years prior to the World War and two following the war, in both cases endeavoring to select years that were normal, because I desire to talk about normal expenditures of Government and not expenditures that are abnormal.

There are those who endeavor to justify mounting expenditures upon the basis of asserted expanding values within the United States. They say that the value of properties of the people of the United States in 1931 is vastly beyond the value in 1891 or 1913. That is true; but in my judgment, any such justification is unsound, for apparent values do not always have relation to normal values; for instance, I am acquainted with a farm property that would have brought $8,000 in 1891, $12,000 in 1913, $32,000 in 1922, and would probably sell for $10,000 to-day. Other properties of industrial character have fluctuated as widely. Values are relative; the same may be said of earning capacity. Hence it is my judgment that the factor of population is a far better measuring stick than speculative factors in determining whether or not expanding cost of government may be justified or condemned.

As a rule, tables showing expenditures of government are arranged by departments, bureaus, and other specific agencies. Such tables are of value for certain purposes, and yet for the purpose of a comparison showing the mounting expenses of government they are misleading; they do not show in clear-cut fashion the purpose for which expenditures are made.

For instance, the War Department in 1931 was charged with total expenditures of $479,942,778. Yet of this amount more than one-fourth, or $134,288,921, was expended upon rivers and harbors and other objects of nonmilitary character. It would be unfair to ascribe such expenditures to military purposes.

Or, again, the Treasury Department is charged with money appropriated for public buildings. This function has no relation whatever to the work of the Treasury Department.

Either one of these items could be carried just as properly under the Department of the Interior. On the other hand, the Interior Department until quite recently was charged with pensions arising out of various wars, a purely military expenditure.

It has occurred to me that a better arrangement of expenditures could be made by following the plan worked out by the Bureau of the Budget and grouping expenditures about a few general headings that would indicate at once the purpose for which money is applied, regardless of the name of the department that carries the appropriations. With this thought I have considered expenditures under three general headings: Civil, national defense, and war burdens.

Under "civil" I have grouped all the normal peace-time expenditures of government; under "national defense" I have included the expenses that are incident to maintaining the military and naval establishments of the United States, and under "war burdens" I have included the moneys appropriated for the casualties of war and for paying the debts incurred by reason of war.

The figures that I have used for the years 1922 and 1931 are from the Bureau of the Budget estimates with very slight rearrangement. The figures for 1891 and 1913 have been compiled in the same manner through the kind assistance and cooperation of officers of the Budget Bureau.

At this point I desire to insert a table that will show the expenditures of the Federal Government for the years indicated:

Summary of expenses of United States Government classified by Government functions

	1891 (population of United States 65,000,000)	1913 (population of United States 95,000,000)	1922 (population of United States 108,000,000)	1931 (population of United States 125,000,000)
Civil functions:
General (Executive, Congress, Judiciary, departments, except Post Office)	$78,894,019	$161,232,850	$468,992,116	$648,540,096
Post Office	72,880,313	265,305,583	552,583,901	802,106,613

Tax refunds and trust funds are omitted as they are not true receipts or true expenditures.

[1] Omits tax refund, $24,206,862.
[2] Omits tax refund, $9,575,124.
[3] Omits tax refund, $87,970,023; trust funds, $85,706,053.34.
[4] Omits tax refund, etc., $90,833,508.59; trust funds, $123,286,430.47. Adjustment between cash expended and checks issued, $37,305,940.65.

A LOOK AT THE TABLE

In preparing the foregoing table I have omitted to use the year 1932. The reason for so doing is because the receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, are not normal and the factors that have entered into the expenditures for that year may never occur again and if they should occur they would need to be treated as abnormal expenditures.

While the national expenditure for 1932 was $5,006,590,305, the national income for the same year was $2,121,000,000 (excluding normal post-office receipts and disbursements) in contrast with an annual income that had been fairly steady from 1922 to 1931 and which had been approximately $4,250,000,000 per year. From the standpoint of income this factor is most disturbing. On the other hand, the Budget for 1932 included several major items that were abnormal. Moneys were appropriated for public-works programs that aggregated some $130,000,000 more than normal; the Reconstruction Finance Corporation called for $500,000,000; the deficiency in the Post Office Department was $202,876,340; the adjusted-service certificates under the bill that was passed last year over the President's veto called for $200,000,000; and subscription to stock in Federal land banks $125,000,000.

The four years, 1891, 1913, 1922, and 1931, that I have used are approximately normal years from the standpoint of our Government's income and expenditures for the periods of time to which they refer. You will recognize the importance of choosing normal years because the inquiry that I am making has to do with whether the given policies under which expenditures are incurred are sound or erroneous, whether or not they shall be modified, and if so, where and to what degree.

What I shall say can best be appreciated by frequent reference to the table. Notice, first, the grand totals representing the expenditures for the given years. It will appear that the expenditures of government have stepped up from $532,042,316 in 1891 to $4,599,532,280 in 1931.

Next notice the separate totals of civil items and observe how they have increased during this period. The civil expenses expanded from $169,539,208 in 1891 to $1,822,307,252 in 1931. The national-defense item increased from $65,592,387 (1891) to $703,531,180 (1931). During the same time the war burden expenditures increased from $296,910,721 (1891) to $2,073,693,848 (1931).

I now direct your attention to the changes that have occurred within the subdivisions of the general classifications.

THE CIVIL ACTIVITIES OF GOVERNMENT

Under civil functions are three broad headings: (a) General; (b) Post Office Department; and (c) public works.

As a matter of fact the two latter are part of the first, but I have kept their money totals separate because they are of such sizable character and pertain to such particular activities that it has seemed well that they be considered as distinct subheads.

GENERAL CIVIL

The general civil expenses include all money appropriated for the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government service of civil character, exclusive of the Post Office Department and public works, that is, all money for general administration, the Congress, the courts, law enforcement, libraries and scientific purposes, education, Indian affairs, the Territories, the land offices, public-land matters, national forests, irrigation, collection of revenues, the Government's share in the District of Columbia, the payment of all employees, with the exception of those in the military service and in general the maintenance of the expenses of all bureaus and commissions of the Government. This item increased from $78,894,019 in 1891 to $648,540,096 in 1931.

The increase over a period of 40 years has been roughly $570,000,000. Of this, the Department of Agriculture for the promotion of its general activities and the guidance of agriculture has claimed $55,395,800. The Federal Farm Board, which is of recent origin, has claimed $190,540,000; the Shipping Board and activities looking to the promotion, regulation, and operation of marine shipping, $83,000,000; the Department of Commerce, $61,000,000; the Treasury Department, $168,000,000; the Department of Justice nearly $30,000,000; the Department of State, $14,000,000; Labor, $12,000,000; sundry activities, such as the Interstate Commerce, Federal Trade, and Civil Service Commissions, the Federal Board for Vocational Education, the District of Columbia, and others, some $60,000,000.

The Federal Farm Board and the Shipping Board are the only two agencies that are fairly new. The other outstanding activities have had years of service, and the very length of time of their existence seems to indicate the great faith of the public in their efficiency and the demand for their continuance in some form or other. Probably under this general heading, whatever economies of sizable proportions may be made must be by the cheese-paring method unless the two activities just mentioned shall permit of reductions, and unless again reductions shall run counter to well-defined public sentiment.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The Post Office Department has gone forward by leaps and bounds. From an expenditure of $72,880,313 in 1891 it has increased until there was required more than $802,000,000 to handle the work of this activity in 1931. Popular education has had much to do with this phenomenon. No longer four or five newspapers and a few magazines satisfy the people of a fair-sized community as was the case 40 years ago, but the demand for reading matter is so great that sacks full of papers and magazines are distributed in communities that are little more than country crossroads. The Parcel Post System, the Rural and City Free Delivery Services, the savings-funds accommodations, facilities for money orders, air mail expansion—all these have added to the total cost. It may be said that the institution is largely self-sustaining. In 1931, out of a total expenditure of more than $802,000,000, the receipts from postal business alone aggregated more than $666,000,000. The deficit for 1931, amounting to $145,725,910, was met by direct appropriations.

Of the larger activities connected with the Post Office Department, the newest one is the air mail service. This activity is running in the red. In 1931 the maintenance of air mail for the domestic service cost $17,693,410, while the revenues received were $6,210,344.86, leaving a net loss of $11,383,065.14. Foreign air mail service cost the United States in 1931 $6,564,858, while the returns from our foreign air mail aggregated $780,422, leaving a net loss of $5,784,435, or a combined net loss for 1931 for air mail service of $17,000,000. Whether the continuance of air mail service upon its present scale or its extension can be sustained by sound policy or is the result of effective propaganda by local communities, manufacturers of aircraft, contractors, and pilots should be the subject of intense study.

Again for carrying mail in American ships to foreign countries upon the basis of combined poundage, mileage, and speed of ships the Post Office Department incurred a loss of $18,911,474 in 1931. This represents the amount that was expended by the department over and above what the cost would have been had the mail been carried upon poundage basis.

A general survey should be made of the Post Office Department with the object of bringing income and outgo to a common plane.

PUBLIC WORKS

The third item is for public works of various types. Here the expenditure has increased from $17,764,876 in 1891 to $371,660,000 in 1931. For the latter year this total includes nearly $75,000,000 for rivers and harbors, nearly $68,000,000 for public buildings, more than $170,000,000 for highways, more than $38,000,000 for flood control, and about $20,000,000 for miscellaneous public works, such as reclamation, national parks, and so forth.

Public expenditure suggested by the public-works item is fostered very largely by local or private interests. This is not to say that the objects for which moneys are appropriated are unworthy. Unquestionably money expended for a large part of the river and harbor work has returned profits to great sections of the country through bringing about settlement and community development, through the reduction of transportation rates, though manifestly some of the projects in the past have required vast expenditures of money and have not justified the outlay. In some instances the projects were unsound; in other instances the projects were undertaken years ahead of the time that economic conditions would have justified their inauguration.

The public-buildings item is one of magnitude. In many places the importance of Federal business, the permanency of the institutions housed, the need for security of records, the location of the public activity from the standpoint of population served—all have combined to make desirable the construction of public buildings which could be justified from the economic standpoint when questions of rent, fire hazards, and similar factors are taken into account.

On the other hand, many public buildings have been constructed where there was no sound justification for outlay of money. Buildings have been erected where all needed Federal activity was being handled fairly satisfactorily and where the interest alone upon the money required for the erection of a public building is far greater than any rental requirements; in addition to this, the Government, upon the completion of a public building, is called upon to maintain the edifice, and it has frequently happened that the cost to the Federal Government has been from four to ten times as great through the construction of a public building as was required for rental of quarters entirely adequate for the accommodation of the public served, and where if the local community had been required to erect the public building through a bond issue or through the levying of a special tax it would not have been provided.

Moneys appropriated for highways are likewise appropriated in large part as the result of intensive campaigns upon the part of sections to be served, highway contractors, professional men who would be given employment, manufacturers of automobiles, and so forth.

Moneys expended for reclamation projects, whether upon the public domain or upon Indian lands, are small in comparison with the sum totals of moneys appropriated for public works; even so, the demand for expenditures has been motivated by dual factors—factors that were sound, resting upon economic reasons, and factors that were unsound, resting upon State or local pride, or the personal wishes and whims of individuals and communities.

GENERAL DISCUSSION

Two general factors determine the dimensions of all three of the headings that I have discussed; that is, general civil expenses, expenses for Post Office Department, and expenses for public works. These factors pertain to the scope of work and to personnel.

With the removal of activities or their curtailment expenses may be reduced. These are times when every activity of the Government ought to be called upon to prove its right to exist. Is the service needed? Has it outlived its usefulness? Could it be curtailed, or should the Government withdraw from the service and let it be carried on by private interests or by some other lesser division of government?

Matched against these interrogatories must be the questions: What would be the effect of discontinuance of the service? Would we lose more by its discontinuance than we would by carrying on? In a large way we must remember that if we are to reduce expenses of government we must reduce Government activities.

The second general factor is that of personnel. As a matter of policy the Government seeks to retain no greater personnel than may be adequate to handle the work involved. It appears, however, that many bureaus are overmanned; inertia and desire to be a "good fellow" creep in.

Heads of bureaus and divisions are not slow to urge employment of additional personnel when work expands, but on the other hand the Appropriations Committee is constantly compelled to force down personnel as work pinches out, because division heads are most reluctant to ask employees who have undertaken work even upon a temporary basis to withdraw from public service.

To some extent the compensation of administrative officers seems to be determined by the number of employees whose work they supervise. This factor should be eliminated. Its existence tends to encourage bureau or division heads to build up large personnel, though they would deny any personal self-interest in so doing.

To some extent economies in personnel can be had by better management; this, for the most part, is an administrative factor.

Again, we may consider whether or not economies may be found through reduction of compensation of personnel. In the first place, the entire expenditure of the Federal Government for personnel under the civil administration is $1,055,970,636.55 (January, 1932). A 10 per cent reduction would be $105,597,000. A 25 per cent reduction would be $263,990,000. When we recall that the total cost of government for 1931 was $4,599,532,280, it will be seen that a reduction of 10 per cent on personnel would mean a saving of only 2.3 per cent on government cost and a reduction of 25 per cent on personnel would mean a saving of about 5 per cent on total cost of government. Indeed, were the entire civilian personnel compensation roll wiped out and were all civilian employees to donate their services, the saving would be less than 23 per cent of the cost of government, as the remaining cost would be $3,540,000,000. But should the reduction be made?

It is the policy of the Government to shape the salaries of employees along the lines of salaries on the outside. The Government seeks neither to disturb conditions of the country by undermining salaries that prevail nor to create dissatisfaction by overpayment. Justice toward all employees under the Government demands that Federal employees be paid as high compensation as would be paid in civilian life, while on the other hand justice toward the tax-paying public demands that they be not overpaid. In this connection permanency of position, leave of absence, retirement pay, and other factors must be taken into account. The problem of compensation must be considered from the standpoint of justice, for, as I have indicated, no modification that reasonably could be made would affect in very material degree the cost of government.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

It will be seen by turning again to the chart that an enormous increase in Federal expenditures has been occasioned by the expanse of moneys appropriated for national defense. The jump has been from $65,592,387 in 1891 to $703,531,180 in 1931.

You will notice from the chart the astounding increase that has been made in war burdens since 1913.

May I observe that national defense and war burdens are discussed so commonly as one item under the heading "Military cost" that I desire to consider them together for just a moment.

The cost of national defense I have just indicated as over $700,000,000 for last year. This item and the cost of war burdens, including pensions, compensation, hospitalization, and caring for principal and interest upon the national debt make a grand total of $2,777,525,280 for 1931, in contrast with $476,119,973 in 1913, the year before the World War broke out in Europe.

Our grief, our horror at this astounding condition can not modify the facts.

> The moving finger writes; and having writ,
> Moves on: nor all your piety nor wit
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
> Nor all your tears wash out a word of it.

In 1913 we paid but $47,090,718 upon the comparatively small national debt, together with interest that had fallen due. Had the United States not become involved in the World War, probably by this time there would be no national debt and no expenditure whatever on account of a debt burden that in 1931 cost the United States over $1,052,000,000.

In the matter of pensions, but for our involvement in the World War there would have been a slight increase over the costs of 1913, because those costs had not come to complete magnitude in the matter of the Spanish-American War veterans. Probably our Army and Navy costs would have increased somewhat, but I doubt if they would have been in figures in which they are written to-day.

It is altogether likely that the total expenditures for national defense and for war burdens in 1931, but for our involvement in the World War, would have been approximately $700,000,000 instead of $2,777,000,000.

I recognize that there are those who urge that had the items for maintenance of Army and Navy establishments been kept up to the point where they urge they should have been maintained prior to the World War, we should not have become involved. Any such statement is purely speculative. We might not have been drawn in; on the other hand, we might have become involved more seriously. The strength of France and Germany and Italy and Russia in their armies and navies, and Great Britain with her sea power, did not save these nations from involvement; the helplessness of China has not prevented wrack and misery of war to her. This argument is urged too strenuously by persons who have axes to grind, by munition and ship manufacturers and by officers who vision high command, to receive our credence without consideration.

So then had our Army and Navy been of larger magnitude in 1914 I do not know whether it would have modified European conditions and prevented the dreadful holocaust of the succeeding years. But, Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely certain that unbridled competition in military and naval establishments leads to international misunderstanding and is provocative of conditions that beget war. On the other hand, it is my firm conviction that had the nations of the world prior to 1914 seen their way clear to enter into agreements that would have prevented competition, that would have prevented rivalry, that would have set up means of determining around the conference table problems that were threatening discord among nations, the World War never would have occurred.

Again, to-day I am just as certain as I am that the sun rises and sets that we are on solid ground when we urge international understandings looking to the removal of competition in military and naval establishments among world nations.

The President of the United States has taken brilliant leadership in programs looking to team work among nations; and whether this year or next or in succeeding years world powers will unite upon formulæ by which through mutual agreement the specter of war may be removed, that day is coming, and I believe that economic pressure upon the rank and file of the populations of the world will hasten the day.

Now, may we turn to the problem of whether or not we may reduce the cost under the head of national defense?

In 1931 we appropriated for national defense $703,531,180. This is an increase from $251,957,456 in 1913, just before the war began in Europe, and it is an increase from the figures $65,592,387 that represent the expenditures in 1891. Of the amount appropriated in 1931, the Army claimed $349,460,176, excluding, of course, moneys expended by the War Department for nonmilitary purposes. The Navy, including the Marine Corps, claimed $354,071,004. Aircraft for both services, exclusive of personnel, was charged with $37,569,250. Naval construction (ships) was charged with $46,216,006. Buildings and other structures for both services were charged with $35,951,879, leaving the major amount of $583,794,044 for salaries of officers and men, subsistence, travel and general operation, and maintenance expenses.

The Army in 1931 had 13,038 commissioned and warrant officers and 118,730 enlisted men, exclusive of 6,500 Philippine Scouts; the Navy had 8,866 commissioned and warrant officers and 84,500 enlisted men; the Marine Corps, 1,186 commissioned and warrant officers and 18,000 enlisted men, not including the National Guard and reserve establishments of the several services.

There is no way that we can reduce markedly the cost of maintaining the Army and Navy of the United States unless we reduce the man power of both and unless we reduce the outstanding items of matériel. Insistent demand is made for the increase of both branches of our national defense. In part, these demands are made by devoted men and women who are discouraged with proposals for international understandings, who have faith in the altruism and unselfish motives of the people of the United States, and who believe that through the mailed fist the United States, regardless of the attitude of other nations, can be a factor for world peace.

Again, in part, these demands are made by selfish groups; by fabricators of ships, munitions, and other military needs; by centers where large pay rolls exist that have to do with fabrication; by officers who, in spite of their intense loyalty and devotion to their country, are blinded oftentimes, in my judgment, by their profession and who in their enthusiasm are led to urge greater and ever greater establishments; and by national reserve groups throughout the United States in both the Army and the Navy who see safety in the ever-expanding powers and personnel of their establishments.

There can be no justification for the broad charge that those who urge moderation in military and naval programs are motivated by any purpose other than the highest well-being of our country. A fine sense of economy is not inconsistent with highest patriotism.

What I have said with regard to reduction of compensation of civilian personnel applies also to personnel under the heading "National defense." Civilian personnel employed in national-defense activities should be upon precise parity with civilian personnel employed elsewhere.

In the matter of compensation of officers and enlisted personnel a different feature is encountered. Officers are educated largely at the expense of the Government, and during their career they are given training and post-graduate courses somewhat analogous to post-graduate work of the civilian professional man. The civilian professional man pays for his post-graduate course, and if he be connected with an educational institution his pay frequently is reduced one-half or more during his sabbatical leave. The Army or naval officer not only continues to receive his full pay and allowances but his course itself is financed by the Federal Government.

Retirement pay is more generous by several hundred per cent than retirement pay in civil-service positions. Permanency of commission and the perquisites that go with officer rank in the Army and Navy and marine establishments are factors that must not be overlooked. Organized essentially for national defense, happily the officers of the defense service are on a peace-time basis of living at most times, and so will want to share whatever temporary or permanent reductions in compensation may be necessary for civilian employees.

Enlisted personnel have never been paid the equivalent of their earning capacity in civil life; on the other hand, the military and naval service for enlisted men offers inviting careers on account of the fact that there is constant opportunity for training in lines in which, under normal conditions, there is fine demand upon retirement. To the pay and to the opportunity for training to which I have referred must be added hospitalization, pensions, and care in soldiers' and sailors' homes, and after sufficient longevity, retirement pay. The pay of enlisted men is far greater actually and relatively than is the pay of enlisted men of foreign countries.

WAR BURDENS

The third great item of expense to the Federal Government is for war burdens. I am asking you to notice the astounding increase that has been made under this heading since 1913. Then we spent for pensions and in care of veterans $177,071,799; in 1931 we spent for the same purpose $1,021,559,957. In 1913 we spent on our national debt $47,090,718; in 1931 we spent on our national debt $1,052,133,891.

Omitting entirely consideration of the sacrifice of human lives, the sorrow, the loss to homes, the setback that has occurred to the moral and spiritual qualities of the human race, the transformation is appalling when measured in the terms of money. Chiefly this is the result of the World War.

Up to the present the World War has cost the people of the United States $41,000,000,000. It is estimated that the cost until the last survivors and their dependents may have passed away will be approximately $100,000,000,000.

In considering the cost of war burden, I have arranged the expenditures under two headings:

(a) Pensions, compensation, insurance, hospitalization; and

(b) Payments upon principal and interest on war debts.

It will be observed that expenditure for war burdens leaped from $224,162,517 in 1913 to $2,073,693,848 in 1931. In 1891 the item for pensions, hospitalization, and so forth, was $124,415,951. Practically all of this expenditure represents obligations growing out of the Civil War. This item had jumped to $1,021,559,957 by 1931, of which amount the sum of $234,127,073 represents Civil War, Spanish War, and other military claims, while $787,032,884 is directly chargeable to the casualties of all kinds of the World War.

As we look to the future, unquestionably the part of the item for Civil War and other responsibilities aside from the World War will decrease. The lines of the veterans of the Civil War are thinning fast; their widows and other dependents are drawing less from year to year. The responsibilities on account of the Spanish War will probably not increase materially, while responsibilities on account of veterans of Indian campaigns and other services will probably be less.

Obligations arising out of the World War afford a most serious responsibility that will carry on for many years. Representative WOODRUM, as he presented to the House justification for the appropriation for the Veterans' Bureau for 1933, upon April 6 last, pointed out that from the beginning of the Republic in 1790 the United States has paid to all veterans and dependents of all wars $14,003,444,577, that of this amount $8,773,142,008 was paid on account of military service other than that incurred in the World War, whereas the benefits to World War veterans, including compensation, hospitalization, and payment to their dependents, are represented by $5,230,302,569. Of this latter amount $600,000,000 has been paid for rehabilitation or for the purpose of putting men who were disabled into condition that would enable them to be self-supporting as individuals.

Of the $4,630,000,000 that the United States has expended for World War benefits approximately one-half has been dispersed in cash; the remainder represents expenses for administration, hospitalization, insurance, and for the building up of the adjusted-service certificate fund.

The second item of war burden is for payment upon the national debt of principal and interest, which in 1931 amounted to $1,052,133,891. Of this sum $611,559,704 represents interest and the balance, $440,574,187, represents the amount that was applied to the reduction of the debt itself.

Having in mind the traditional integrity of the people of the United States that will not permit our country to flinch from meeting an obligation, it is unthinkable that the debt and the interest will not be paid. The only possible way by which this enormous part of the burden can be disturbed would be by deferment of the amount due in full or in part. Such a course would add to the obligation ultimately, for it would increase the interest factor.

HOW REDUCE

Again I hark back to the demand that is made that we reduce the expenditures of Government. How shall we reduce? We must be specific. It will not do merely to say earnestly that we must reduce by 25 per cent or 50 per cent, or that we must go back to pre-war level of expenditures. That does not solve the problem. If we are to reduce, we must find a way.

The earnest business men of every city and community in the country, earnest citizens generally, civic groups of whatever name, who are urging reductions of national expenditures can aid the administration and the Congress. They can aid by recognizing that much of government is desirable but not essential. They can aid by being willing to temporize and forego some of the conveniences of government that they have enjoyed in the past, and by omitting to urge that these conveniences expand. Such procedure will mean sacrifice; it may mean less frequency of city or rural mail service; it may mean moderation in moneys expended upon National Guard and Naval Reserve; it may mean slowing down of highway and public-building programs; it may mean a more conservative course carried forward under so-called 50-50 appropriations; it may mean modification of programs for national defense; it may mean a restudy and a recasting of the burdens of war.

Sound business men must recognize that every dollar that is expended by the Federal Treasury comes from the pockets of the people just as surely and just as inevitably as do the taxes they are paying for town and city streets, county courthouses, local relief, or local highway programs; yet a strange phenomenon is constantly experienced by Members of Congress. Citizens in all States and in all communities demand material reduction of expenditures and in the same mail and sometimes in the same set of resolutions demand moneys for local projects. They seem to forget that if it is fair that Blankroads in the State of Kansas be granted a public building it is just as fitting that one be erected in Crosstown in the State of Florida.

During the present hectic session when Members of Congress have been trying to find ways to reduce, they have been importuned by high-pressure minority groups that no cuts be made that will affect them and, indeed, some groups have urged that their positions be made more permanent, more attractive, more secure. My office files are filled with letters from all parts of the United States, inspired doubtless by those who have axes to grind, demanding that no cut be made that will affect some particular Federal activity that from a national point of view it has seemed could well be spared. I doubt not that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent during the present Congress in trying to arouse sentiment against every essential cut proposed by the Congress or recommended by the administration.

We can reduce, but to reduce we must look beyond our local projects. We must view the problem from the standpoint of the Nation. We can lessen the expenses of government, but we must sacrifice. It is one of the gravest fallacies that pervades our country that if the Government itself will only assume the responsibility of furnishing the money for a local project, or pay for it in part, the cost will not be felt. There is no hocus-pocus by which we can add to items, maintain the individual items at their level, or increase them, and reduce the total of local, State, or national budgets.

GEORGE ROGERS CLARK SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. The Chair makes the following appointment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of the act approved May 23, 1928 (45 Stat. 723), as amended by the act approved February 28, 1931 (46 Stat. 1459), the Chair appoints the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. GILBERT, to fill the vacancy on the George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission caused by the death of Hon. Albert H. Vestal.

ADJOURNMENT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 12, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

630. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report dated July 9, 1932, from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination and survey of Ashland Harbor, Wis.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

631. A letter from the directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, transmitting a report of the corporation covering its operations for the period from the organization of the corporation on February 2, 1932, to June 30, 1932, inclusive (S. Doc No. 135); to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LUCE: A bill (H. R. 12941) to create a national park trust fund board, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CORNING: A bill (H. R. 12942) to amend the national prohibition act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SANDERS of Texas: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 467) to provide for the sale of internal-revenue stamps by postmasters of the United States; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WEST: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 36) to create a joint congressional committee, to be known as the joint committee on economy; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BACHMANN: A bill (H. R. 12943) for the relief of Harry E. Engle; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BLACK: A bill (H. R. 12944) for the relief of Winifred Meagher; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii: A bill (H. R. 12945) for the relief of Sam Mana, owner of the schooner Moi Wahine; the members of the crew; and the Hawi Mill & Plantation Co. (Ltd.), owner of the cargo on board said schooner; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PARSONS: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 468) authorizing the President of the United States to present the distinguished-service medal to Frederick H. Morlan; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

8521. By Mr. JOHNSON of Texas: Telegram of R. G. Williams, city manager of Bryan, Tex., favoring exempting patrons of municipally owned electric plants from electric-energy tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8522. By Mr. MEAD: Petition of citizens and voters of the United States, favoring a redress of grievances; to the Committee on Economy.

8523. By the SPEAKER: Petition of Alice B. McCall, requesting Congress to consider her claim for compensation; to the Committee on Claims.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JULY 12, 1932

(Legislative day of Monday, July 11, 1932)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the approval of the Journal of the legislative day of Monday, July 11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Reed
Austin	Dale	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Davis	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Dickinson	Kean	Schall
Bingham	Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Black	Fess	Keyes	Shipstead
Blaine	Fletcher	King	Shortridge
Borah	Frazier	La Follette	Smoot
Bratton	George	Lewis	Steiwer
Broussard	Glass	Long	Stephens
Bulkley	Glenn	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Bulow	Goldsborough	McKellar	Townsend
Byrnes	Gore	McNary	Trammell
Capper	Hale	Metcalf	Tydings
Caraway	Harrison	Moses	Vandenberg
Cohen	Hastings	Norbeck	Wagner
Connally	Hatfield	Norris	Walcott
Coolidge	Hayden	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Hebert	Patterson	Watson
Costigan	Howell	Pittman	White

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is detained from the Senate because of a death in his family.

Mr. GLASS. My colleague, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business, being in attendance upon the Geneva naval conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider entered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], called up by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON].

DEATH OF HENRY M. ROSE

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, with a sense of very deep personal loss and sorrow, I am announcing the death last evening of Mr. Henry M. Rose, of Michigan, the Assistant Secretary of the Senate. Mr. Rose became Chief Clerk of the Senate in 1900, and in 1905 was named as Assistant Secretary by special resolution of the Senate. He held this honorable position until the hour of his passing to his eternal reward. I believe he is the only Senate employee whose position has ever been made continuous by statute. This is the best possible and the most eloquent possible demonstration of the high place that Mr. Rose made for himself in the affection and respect and esteem of the Senate. For 30 years he has played his important rôle in the history of the Senate and the country. He was able, efficient, capable, and utterly dependable. He possessed both genius and character. He combined kindliness with dignity. He was ever a credit to himself, the Senate, and the Nation. He was a loyal American who dedicated himself to the practical patriotism of everlasting good citizenship.

Out of order, I ask unanimous consent to introduce the usual resolution for reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 272) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1932, to Rena Rose, widow of Henry M. Rose, late the Assistant Secretary of the Senate, a sum equal to one year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, we all learned with very great sorrow of the death of Mr. Rose. For many years he was an honored and efficient employee of the Senate. Throughout a long period he suffered illness. His patience and fortitude, displayed at all times during his affliction demonstrated remarkable force of character. We grieve at his departure.

DEFINITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUOR

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a Senate resolution and I ask that it may be read. I do not think there will be any objection to its consideration and passage. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. May I say to the Senator in charge of the unfinished business that if it leads to any discussion I shall withdraw the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be received and read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 271), as follows:

Whereas there appears to be some doubt in the minds of certain Senators as to what constitutes intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service is requested to make inquiry among the leading physicians and chemists in the United States as to the amount of alcohol a beverage may contain without being intoxicating, and to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the consensus of opinion with respect thereto.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it is obvious that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] is not a lawyer. With his many attainments, moral and mental, he labors under the disqualification of never having studied law, because he proposes to submit evidence after the case is closed. His would have been a timely and sensible move, a move that a trained lawyer would have made, whilst the amendment was pending.

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut has been attempting to do what he calls "test the sincerity of Democratic Senators." Never did he apply a true test. Let me tell him how to test the sincerity of Democratic Senators. Let him introduce a joint resolution proposing to amend the Constitution by abolishing the eighteenth amendment and let the roll be called. There will be no attempt on the part of Democratic Senators to avoid their platform.

The Senator from Connecticut, with a shrewdness that I have not heretofore observed, but with that left-handed cunning which always destroys the man who attempts to employ it, seemed to believe that by bringing before the Senate a measure that would not be constitutional he could thereby make what he is pleased to call a "test of the sincerity of Democratic Senators." But the Senator from Connecticut deceives no one. He did not of course attempt willfully to deceive anyone. It was only his left-handed cunning that caused him to think he could deceive somebody.

There is the test if the Senator wants one. Let him introduce a joint resolution proposing to repeal the eighteenth amendment, let the roll be called, and then after Democrats shall have voted he may talk about a test. But let him not wash his hands with invisible soap in imperceptible water and try to put us to a test by asking us to do an unconstitutional thing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the request of the Senator from Connecticut for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The regular order is the question of agreeing to the motion to reconsider entered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] and called up by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. On that question the Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, there is no attempt here, and there will be no attempt on the part of anybody who claims to be a Democrat, to avoid a vote on the question of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I shall yield after I secure permission to have the clerk read an editorial from the Arizona Daily Star, one of the leading Democratic dailies of the Southwest, published at Tucson, Ariz. This able newspaper has not always supported me politically, but that does not constitute a reason why I should not in fairness designate it as one of the ablest of all the journals published in the United States. I ask that the editorial to which I have referred may be read at the desk, and then I shall yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read the editorial.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Arizona Daily Star, July 6, 1932]

THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM

The platform adopted by the Democratic Party at Chicago is one of the most remarkable and unusual political documents in American history. It is unusual and remarkable on account of its brevity. Never before in the history of presidential campaigns has any party adopted such a brief platform. Whereas this platform comprises fewer than 1,500 words, the usual party platform in a presidential campaign totals more than 10,000 words.

On account of its brevity, the Democratic platform is remarkably free from ambiguous language. The ordinary man in the street can understand its words, and can take the time to read such a short document. In this short space of words the platform takes positive action on every great issue before the country.

First of all it frankly states that the only hope for improving present conditions lies in a drastic change in economic and governmental policies. The platform promises to make these changes by a 25 per cent reduction in governmental expenditures, by the maintenance of the national credit by a budget based on accurate estimates of income, a sound currency at all hazards, and a competitive tariff for revenue with a fact-finding tariff commission free from Executive interference. An international economic conference would be maintained to restore international trade and facilitate the exchange of goods by working out a system of lower tariffs on a reciprocal basis.

The platform advocates shorter working hours in industry, advance planning of public works, unemployment and old-age insurance under State laws. It promises an adequate Army and Navy, strict and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws to prevent monopoly and unfair trade practices, and the conservation, development, and use of the Nation's water power in the public interest. It attacks the evil of the holding company in both public utilities, banking, and industry. It urges quicker relief to depositors of closed banks. Noticeably it promises the fullest measure of justice for all war veterans who have suffered disability or disease caused by or resulting from actual service in time of war.

In the matter of international relations the Democratic campaign document promises a policy of arbitration in the settlement of international disputes, no interference in the internal affairs of other nations, adherence to the World Court with pending reservations, and the pact of Paris (the Kellogg treaty) to be made effective by provisions for consultation and conference in case of threatened violation of treaties, and opposition to cancellation of the war debts.

On the prohibition plank favoring the repeal of the eighteenth amendment the Democratic Party took its boldest stand. It pledges the party to work for the repeal of the prohibition amendment and the modification of the Volstead Act, but promises Federal aid to those States that wish to be dry. This plank received overwhelming ratification in the convention. Every State in the Union represented at the convention save three joined in the demonstration of approval. This plank is a matter of such vital importance that room does not permit its discussion at this moment, but suffice it to say that there is in reality little difference between this plank and the Republican plank save that of honesty. The Democratic plank is an honest one; the Republican plank a subterfuge designed to win the votes of both drys and wets.

The entire Democratic platform is noteworthy for its honesty and for its clear and frank stand on every great issue. Of course, it is subject to criticism. It advocates some policies to which we are opposed, but as a whole the platform is one of the best ever adopted by any political party. It will be a vital force in winning to the Democratic standard millions of votes from that great mass of independent Americans who value honesty in politics above everything else.

We commend it to the voters of Tucson and Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to say that no Democrat would oppose taking up the proposal to repeal the eighteenth amendment. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. ASHURST. Let the Senator bring forward his joint resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well, Mr. President. I then ask that there may be read at the desk Senate Joint Resolution 164, now lying upon the desk, and I shall ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that we may vote on the joint resolution in accordance with the invitation of the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 164) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors, which is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States, which conventions shall be composed in each State of delegates elected by a majority vote of the electors of the State:

"ARTICLE —

"Article XVIII of the amendments to this Constitution is hereby repealed. The power to regulate or to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors is reserved to the several States, except that no State may prohibit the transportation of intoxicating liquors in bond across its territory if such liquors are shipped in interstate commerce between points wholly outside the territorial limits of such State. The Congress shall have the power to regulate the sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors in interstate or foreign commerce in a manner not to abridge or deny the powers herein reserved to the several States."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I inquire if the joint resolution is proposed as an amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. In answer to the invitation of the Senator from Arizona, I said that I would ask unanimous consent that the pending bill may be temporarily laid aside in order that the joint resolution may be considered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator in charge of the bill consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside in order to consider a joint resolution proposing to repeal the prohibition amendment?

Mr. WATSON. I do not. I have no objection to the consideration of the measure on its merits as a separate proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Neither have I, Mr. President.

Mr. WATSON. But if my friend will allow me to answer him, I have constantly opposed adding any amendment to the pending bill at any time, and I am opposing it now. If the joint resolution be proposed as an amendment, then I object to its consideration, and, if it be not proposed as an amendment, if it involves laying aside even temporarily the pending measure, I object to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, it can only be considered either as an amendment to the pending bill—and I apprehend that the Senator from Connecticut would not think it practicable to submit a constitutional amendment as part of a bill——

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly not, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Or as an independent proposition while a bill is under consideration.

We have spent a large part of this session discussing the question of prohibition. So far as I am concerned, when an opportune occasion arises I shall not object to the consideration of a proper amendment submitting the question of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; but I suggest to the Senator in charge of the pending bill if he expects ever to bring the matter to a conclusion, it will be necessary to take steps to prevent the injection of such questions as that now presented by the Senator from Connecticut.

Everyone here with the slightest comprehension of the rules of the Senate realizes that this is an entirely independent proposition; that it can not be disposed of without somewhat prolonged debate; and that even though two Senators, one on each side of the Chamber, should themselves agree to waive the right of debate, others will not be precluded from discussing the subject to their entire satisfaction. So it is my suggestion that the Senate proceed in a more orderly manner; that it devote itself to the consideration of the issues before the Senate, and proceed to the consideration of other measures when there is opportunity to do so. That was exactly the meaning of the vote that was cast yesterday, referring to the beer amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I ask if there is pending before the Senate a unanimous-consent request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been put. The joint resolution was being read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the matter is permitted to take the course that is indicated by what has been transpiring here this morning, if the Senator in charge of the pending bill submits to the introduction of an entirely extraneous proposition——

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Which he knows can not be disposed of while the home loan bank bill is under consideration, I shall move to proceed to the consideration of another measure.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I do not know what more the Senator could expect me to say than I have said, that I am opposed to this proposition——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana had chosen to do so he could have objected to the presentation by the Senator from Connecticut of the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Indiana is perfectly familiar with the rules and procedure of the Senate. He realizes that it is not in order for a Senator, while a bill is under consideration, to present a proposed constitutional amendment or any other resolution relating to a subject matter entirely apart from the bill. If we are to pursue this course, if while the Senate is discussing a measure of importance entirely extraneous matters are to be interjected, then I myself shall take some responsibility and attempt to force a conclusion of the issue before the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, we are all aware of the fact that for six days the pending bill has been buffeted about while we have discussed various phases of prohibition. The Senator from Connecticut this morning, within his rights, rose to offer a resolution. I did not know what it was. It was presented and read for the information of the Senate, and the reading had not been concluded before other Senators got the floor to say something about it. Of course, I expected to object to it, because he asked to lay aside the pending bill temporarily for the consideration of the joint resolution. I intend to vote for the proposition if it comes before the Senate in its own proper time on its own proper merits, but I am opposed to putting it as an amendment to this bill, and I am opposed to setting aside this bill temporarily for the purpose of considering it. I do not know what more I could say than that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] on behalf of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] to reconsider the vote by which the so-called Couzens amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 1155. An act to establish a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes;

S. 2958. An act to amend the charter of the Firemen's Insurance Co. of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; and

S. 3792. An act to amend sections 5 and 6 of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act to prohibit the killing of wild birds and wild animals in the District of Columbia," and thereby to establish a game and bird sanctuary of the Potomac River and its tributaries in the said District.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3400) to amend an act of Congress approved June 18, 1898, entitled "An act to regulate plumbing and gas fitting in the District of Columbia," with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7894) to promote safety on the streets and highways of the District of Columbia by providing for the financial responsibility of owners and operators of motor vehicles for damages caused by motor vehicles on the public highways in the District of Columbia, to prescribe penalties for the violation of the provisions of this act, and for other purposes, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 1155. An act to establish a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes;

S. 2958. An act to amend the charter of the Firemen's Insurance Co. of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia;

S. 3792. An act to amend sections 5 and 6 of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act to prohibit the killing of wild birds and wild animals in the District of Columbia," and thereby to establish a game and bird sanctuary of the Potomac River and its tributaries in the said District;

H. R. 2704. An act for the relief of Charles Lamkin;

H. R. 7293. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to the city of Springfield, Mass., permission to construct and maintain a highway bridge across United States military reservation at the Springfield Armory, Mass.; and

H. J. Res. 361. Joint resolution to authorize the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service to make a survey as to the existing facilities for the protection of the public health in the care and treatment of leprous persons in the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes.

UNITED STATES ROANOKE COLONY COMMISSION

Pursuant to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 26) to establish a commission to be known as the United States Roanoke Colony Commission to report a plan and program for the celebration in 1934 of the three hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of English-speaking civilization in America on Roanoke Island, N. C., the Vice President appointed the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] members of the commission on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the petition of sundry citizens, former members of the American Expeditionary Force, now unemployed, signed by Royal W. Robertson, commander California division, and others of the States of California, Arizona, Texas, and Kentucky, praying for the passage of legislation for the immediate payment at face value of adjusted-compensation certificates (bonus), to be "granted solely to the needy unemployed, as certified by local official welfare or veterans' bureaus," etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of sundry citizens, being former service men of the United States, signed by Hugh L. Scott (Alabama) and others from the States of Illinois, Kansas, Oregon, and Texas, praying for the passage of legislation for the immediate payment at face value, without interest, of adjusted-compensation certificates (bonus), such payment to be financed by an expansion of the currency and the certificates to be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury as collateral for greenbacks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

OBLIGATIONS OF CITIZENSHIP—MORAL CONDITIONS

Mr. GEORGE presented resolutions approved by the annual summer assembly of the South Georgia Conference, Methodist Young People's Organization, at Macon, Ga., which were referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has refused citizenship to Prof. Douglas Clyde Macintosh, of Yale University, on the ground that he was unwilling to subject his conscience to an act of Congress in the event of a war which he might at the time believe to be unjust and contrary to the will of God;

Therefore we, as citizens of the United States, refuse to acknowledge the obligation which the Supreme Court declares to be binding on all citizens, whether native born or naturalized. We can not accept an act of Congress as the final interpretation of the will of God. In our allegiance to our country we withhold nothing, not even our lives, but our consciences we can not give. They belong to God.

We therefore earnestly hope that Congress will amend the naturalization laws so as to unbind the consciences of American citizens, and to insure that no alien who is otherwise qualified and who is willing to be subject to the same obligations in all respects as a native-born citizen shall be refused citizenship.

Furthermore, we young people of the South Georgia Conference, Methodist Young People's Organization, deplore the effort of the liquor forces to exploit the youth of to-day by declaring them to be the most corrupt of all times. Our conviction is that their base motive is to attempt to sufficiently weaken the eighteenth amendment as to return the legalized traffic of liquor, one of the ancient curses of humanity. As a group of Christian youth, we want to go on record as condemning the corrupt motive of the liquor forces and as favoring the eighteenth amendment and all laws pursuant thereto.

Whereas the political revolutions of early American conditions demanded a "Light Horse" Harry, a Henry Lee, and a Patrick Henry, such leaders being recruited from the youth of that day, so in the moral revolution of to-day as manifested in the activities of the racketeers, kidnapers, and liquor propagandists, a graver condition has arisen that constitutes a ringing challenge for courage and moral stamina. The youth of our day must supply this moral leadership. Realizing that the youth of to-day must constructively deal with the great issues of their day, we challenge you to rise to the height of moral leadership demanded by these issues.

Respectfully submitted.

COMPARATIVE ELECTRIC RATES IN CALIFORNIA

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, some three or four years ago the public-utility section of the Commonwealth Club of California undertook the study of the comparative merits of public and private development and distribution of electricity. They appointed a committee, they employed experts of all kinds, and made a very thorough study of the subject, running over two or three years.

The report of that committee has just been made by its chairman, Mr. Louis Bartlett, former mayor of Berkeley, Calif. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COMPARATIVE ELECTRIC RATES IN CALIFORNIA—REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON POWER RATES APPOINTED BY THE PUBLIC UTILITY SECTION OF THE COMMONWEALTH CLUB OF CALIFORNIA

By Louis Bartlett, chairman

This report covers a comparison of certain rates charged by municipalities owning their own electrical-distributing systems with the corresponding rates of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., San Joaquin Light & Power Co., and the Southern California Edison Co., all in California. To these have been added corresponding rates charged in the publicly owned systems in Ottawa, Canada, and Tacoma and Seattle, in Washington. In these three systems the power is generated in whole or in part and transmitted by public agency; in Ottawa by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission, sometimes known as Hydro; in Seattle and Tacoma the generation and transmission is municipal.

It is usual to divide the cost of providing electrical energy into three parts—generation, transmission, and distribution. Sometimes power is generated and sold at the power plant; sometimes it is generated and transmitted to the area of use and there sold at wholesale to a distributing agency; sometimes all three processes of generation, transmission, and distribution are performed by the same agency.

It is important in a study of comparative rates to bear in mind the several costs involved in these operations.

A study of these relative costs was made in 1927 (Bulletin No. 20, State Department of Public Works) by Lester S. Ready, former chief engineer of the California Railroad Commission, who found that on the average these costs were in the following proportion:

	Cents
Cost per kilowatt-hour at delivery of hydroelectric power houses	0.374
Cost per kilowatt-hour at outlet of substations	0.836
Cost per kilowatt-hour for wholesale power	0.927
Cost per kilowatt-hour for retail power	1.568
Cost per kilowatt-hour for combined lighting and power	2.277
Cost per kilowatt-hour for general lighting	5.30

These costs have been somewhat lowered, but the ratios between them are still approximately correct.

It is evident, therefore, that a comparison of rates for power in the power house can be compared only with the cost at another power house; that the cost of power generated and transmitted for sale at wholesale can be compared only with power similarly generated and transmitted, and that the cost of power distributed to the ultimate consumer can only be compared with power similarly distributed.

The "over-all average selling price" of power means nothing. To illustrate: The Southern California Edison Co. supplies the Department of Water and Power of Los Angeles with about two-thirds of the power which the latter distributes, so that the sale price of the private company is the buying price of the city. The cost of distribution in the city must be added to the sale price of the Southern California Edison Co. in arriving at the cost of the power to the ultimate consumer. A statement that the average sale price of the power of the Southern California Edison Co. is less than the average sale price by the Bureau of Power and Light makes no useful comparison, and, in fact, is altogether misleading. The rates to be compared should be the rates to the ultimate consumer.

Almost all California cities that distribute power purchase it from other agencies. A few of them—Los Angeles, Pasadena, Palo Alto, Avalon, Turlock, and Modesto irrigation districts—generate a part of what they consume. San Francisco and Merced generate and sell to private companies for resale. On the other hand, the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. and the Southern California Edison Co. generate, transmit, sell a portion of their power for resale, and sell the rest to ultimate consumers.

It is, therefore, necessary in order to arrive at just conclusions, to compare costs to the ultimate consumer. Here we are at once faced with difficulties if we try to compare every rate. Rates are usually composed of two elements—a demand charge and an energy charge. For example, one's bill for domestic consumption may begin at 40 cents before the switch is turned on; to this is added an energy charge of so much per kilowatt-hour consumed. The demand charge is justified because the agency that supplies the power must bring its facilities into the place of use, must keep them in repair, and must have the energy available when wanted. The demand charge is intended to cover a return on that investment and the cost of upkeep—both substantially the same whether current is used or not.

The demand charge is not always the same. In some places it may be 40 cents and in other places 75 cents or $1 or higher for domestic consumption. It is much higher for other types of service, for instance, commercial lighting, street lighting, pumping, etc.

Besides a variable demand charge, the cost of current varies as different amounts are consumed. In some places the charge for current may begin at 5 cents per kilowatt-hour up to 50 kilowatt-hours, when the rate changes for another block of energy; and it may become gradually less for each successive block. There is no uniform point at which the rates change on all systems. It is evident that the various combinations of demand charge and energy charge for much or little power can produce an almost infinite variety of rates for any given quantity of power.

The complexity of the task set before this committee is therefore evident. It has been found impractical to make a comparison of all of the rate schedules used by the power companies and by cities. The committee has perforce been obliged to content itself with a comparison of rates under three main schedules in general use.

1. The combination domestic rate, covering the use of electricity for light, heat, and power in the homes up to a total use of 200 kilowatt-hours per month.

2. A comparison of commercial lighting rates up to 100 kilowatt-hours a month.

3. A comparison of power rates for 5, 10, and 20 horsepower loads.

These studies have been made by J. F. Byxbee, city engineer of Palo Alto. Too much commendation can not be given Mr. Byxbee for the care and patience with which he has carried on this valuable work. His results are shown graphically on the accompanying charts.

Chart No. 1. A comparison of domestic combination electric rates for the years 1930 and 1931, up to a total monthly consumption of 200 kilowatt-hours.

It is to be noted that the cities and irrigation districts shown on the graph fall into three classes—metropolitan areas, like Los Angeles; smaller communities, like Redding, Lodi, Roseville, and Riverside; and country areas, like the Turlock and Modesto irrigation districts. The California Railroad Commission allows somewhat higher rates in the smaller cities and rural areas than in the metropolitan area. The black line representing the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. rate D 1 represents the lowest rate of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., applicable only in metropolitan territory, whereas the majority of the cities listed are in the category of smaller cities, to which a relatively higher rate applies. This chart therefore makes a somewhat more favorable showing for the Pacific Gas & Electric rates than is entirely fair to the smaller cities.

The rates of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. are not shown on this chart, as they are identical with the city of Los Angeles, the railroad commission having fixed the rates of that company on a competitive basis with those of the city.

(NOTE.—A tabular reproduction of the data in this chart is found not feasible.)

Chart No. 2: The great majority of domestic consumers have monthly bills ranging from one to three dollars. Chart No. 2 shows the amount of power purchasable for these various sums in the year 1931 under domestic combination electric service schedule, and chart No. 3 shows the number of kilowatt-hours purchasable for $5, $8, and $16 under the same schedule.

It is noteworthy that all of these charts show that the great majority of cities sell power more cheaply under this schedule than the private companies.

(NOTE.—The data in tabular form follows:)

Chart No. 7. Gives in greater detail comparison of the rates of the town of Lodi with those of the P. G. & E.

(NOTE.—Not reproduced.)

Examination of these graphs shows that it is quite generally true that lower rates prevail under public ownership than with the regulated monopolies of the private companies.

But the question of rates is only one side of the picture. What of the financial results of the operations previously shown? Do municipal plants extending cheap service make money, break even, or do they call upon the city authorities to make contribution to the tax rate? These questions are answered by a computation made by Mr. Byxbee. Sheet 8 is a diagram showing gross revenue, total cost, and surplus earnings of electric plants on the Pacific coast.

Total cost includes the full cost of production, transmission, distribution, utilization, interest and depreciation, taxes, and miscellaneous. The tax item is computed as 10½ per cent of the gross receipts; that is to say, to the total cost in each municipality is added a bookkeeping item of 10½ per cent of the gross receipts, so that the diagram makes a fair comparison between public and private companies.

The records included in this diagram are for the year 1930, or for the fiscal year 1930–31. It is to be noted that none of the municipal plants has been operating without a substantial surplus after making the bookkeeping charge for taxes. The least surplus, that of Burbank, is of about 9½ per cent; the highest, that of Pasadena, is 35 per cent; four are over 32½ per cent; six are over 22 per cent; and all other municipal plants except Seattle and Burbank show over 17½ per cent. If we add to these surpluses the 10½ per cent bookkeeping charge for taxes, we get some idea of how profitable the electrical distributing business has been made by the cities that have adopted it.

Chart No. 8 shows the amount of taxes that would be paid by each municipal plant were it not tax-free. This amount in every case goes into the treasury of the city, together with the balance of the surpluses. The total surplus earnings, less taxes, of the 15 cities listed on chart 8, amount to $5,223,622.92. The corresponding taxes that would have been paid by private companies amount to $2,974,136.45. The total amount of both, namely $8,197,759.37 is turned into the treasury of the cities.

What becomes of these large sums. A large part is used for additions and betterments to the electric-light plants, thus obviating the necessity of issuing bonds as the private companies must do to extend their systems. In fact, most of the municipal systems have been largely built up out of profits. A table showing the value of California plants as of 1928 is found on page 42 of Public Ownership on Trial, by Frederick L. Bird and Frances M. Ryan. This table omits Los Angeles and Pasadena, which are separately treated in the book. It shows that the value of the systems is $4,692,043.56, against which there was a bonded indebtedness of less than one-sixth, namely, $719,135.71. In only one city—Riverside—was any contribution ever obtained from taxes, and that was a small amount, $6,330.70. On the other hand, contributions from electric profits have been made to the cities in very large amounts. The figures are not available for all the cities, but the total of contributions of the cities listed exceeded by far the bonded debt. In Los Angeles the value of the plant and equipment exceeded the liabilities by over $23,000,000. In Pasadena the city's equity in a plant of over $4,500,000 was more than $3,500,000. The last balance sheets of the bureau of light and power of Los Angeles and of the Pasadena municipal electric-light plants are annexed as sheet No. 7.

Most cities use a considerable part of their surplus from electric operation for the direct reduction of the tax rate or by applying it to permanent improvements which would otherwise have to be paid for by an added tax; thus, Alameda has built a health center, Lodi a city hall, Redding an airport, and has completed a street-paving program, while Palo Alto contributes annually about $50,000 to general tax reduction.

REMARKS BY LOUIS BARTLETT, CHAIRMAN, ON THE PRECEDING REPORT

Mr. Ready has suggested that it is more expensive to serve power in sparsely settled country districts than in crowded areas, and that the rates of the private companies in California may have been adjusted so that a part of the cost of serving the country is borne by the cities. This is offered as an explanation of the poor showing made by the private companies in the charts we have just seen.

We are able to test this theory in two country areas—the Turlock and Modesto irrigation districts, where there is public distribution of power. Ten years ago these districts were buying power from the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. and the San Joaquin Light & Power Co. The districts built competing distributing systems, cut their rates at once, and have cut them successively until they are now more than 40 per cent less than when the private companies were selling power in the same territory. Perhaps I should qualify the phrase "same territory." When the private company was selling power in the Modesto territory, it did not sell throughout the entire irrigation district. It had the city of Modesto, which the district now has, and a territory of about 3 miles around the city limits, which it would not extend without payment of the cost of line extensions. Since then anyone on any public road can get power from the Modesto irrigation district plant without paying for line extensions, and the district is completely served by distribution lines. The rates are 40 per cent or more lower than under the private companies. These new lines have been built out of profits, and besides that the Modesto irrigation district made a profit last year which enabled it to reduce the taxes for water by over 30 per cent. Perhaps other rural communities can do as well.

With relation to Mr. Uhl's figures, his comparison of rates made after adding 10.8 per cent to cover taxes to the actual rates paid does not mean a thing, for it is based upon two fallacies; first, that the taxpayer and the rate payer are the same persons, which manifestly is not true, as there are many more rate payers than taxpayers; second, the amount of the taxes paid by a taxpayer is determined by the value of his property, whereas the electric light bill has no relation to the value of his property. It is based on current consumed.

The true comparisons are the ones that I have given in my charts. That gives a comparison of rates. Chart No. 8 shows what surpluses have been earned at these rates. In all cases they greatly exceed the amount of taxes that would have been charged the private companies; and the big surpluses, as already pointed out, have been used by the cities for the purposes for which taxes would otherwise have been raised.

With reference to Mr. Uhl's comparison of rates for street-lighting service, let me read a telegram from Mr. E. F. Scattergood, chief engineer of the Los Angeles Bureau of Power and Light:

"Supplementing letter mailed yesterday. Power companies always cut street-lighting rates to head off public ownership and then get it back out of general consumers from ten to twenty fold."

This is exactly what is happening in San Francisco. Los Angeles consumers are saving twelve to fifteen times more in bills for general electric service than San Francisco people are saving in street lighting by comparison.

APPENDIX

STATISTICAL DATA ON MUNICIPALLY OWNED AND OPERATED ELECTRIC POWER PLANTS IN CALIFORNIA

Annexed is a number of informative and illustrative tables concerning municipal plants in California. The source is indicated in the notes.

1. General data on public light and power plants now in operation in California.
2. Population area and consumers.
3. Percentage of increase in consumers and output, 1925–26 and 1927–28.
4. Comparison of net revenue from distribution plants and general taxes.
5. Comparison of electric bills in various California localities.
6. Charges per service and miscellaneous data concerning some California plants—Burbank, Glendale, Los Angeles, Redding, Pasadena, Roseville, Riverside, Palo Alto.

REPORTS OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. BORAH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon, as indicated:

S. 4553. An act for the relief of Elizabeth Millicent Trammell (Rept. No. 996);

S. 4767. An act for the relief of Mucia Alger (Rept. No. 997); and

S. J. Res. 195. Joint resolution granting permission to Hugh S. Cumming, Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service; John D. Long, medical director United States Public Health Service; and Clifford R. Eskey, surgeon, United States Public Health Service, to accept and wear certain decorations bestowed upon them by the Governments of Ecuador, Chile, and Cuba.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mr. VANDENBERG (for Mr. WATERMAN), from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on to-day, July 12, 1932, that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 1155. An act to establish a Board of Indeterminate Sentence and Parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes;

S. 2958. An act to amend the charter of the Firemen's Insurance Co. of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; and

S. 3792. An act to amend sections 5 and 6 of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act to prohibit the killing of wild birds and wild animals in the District of Columbia," and thereby to establish a game and bird sanctuary of the Potomac River and its tributaries in the said District.

BILL INTRODUCED

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH introduced a bill (S. 4970) to amend section 808 of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926, as amended by section 443 of the revenue act of 1928, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT OF THE REVENUE ACT OF 1932—TAX ON ELECTRICAL ENERGY

Mr. SHORTRIDGE introduced a bill (S. 4971) to amend section 616 of the revenue act of 1932, relating to the tax on electrical energy, which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 616 of the revenue act of 1932, as amended, is amended—

(1) By striking out, in subdivision (a), the words "and to be collected from the vendor."

(2) By striking out all of subdivision (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) The tax imposed by this section shall be collected and paid in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall by regulations prescribe, except that no obligation shall, by reason of this subdivision, be imposed upon any vendor in connection with the collection of any tax under this section. The provisions (including penalties) of section 1114 of the revenue act of 1926, of sections 3176 (as amended) and 3184 of the Revised Statutes, and of section 771 of this act, shall be applicable in respect of such tax, in lieu of the provisions of sections 619 to 629, inclusive, of this act."

(3) By adding at the end of subdivision (c) the following: "As used in this subdivision, the term 'political subdivision' includes any district created under the laws of a State or Territory for the purpose of constructing or operating a public utility."

SEC. 2. This act shall apply only to electrical energy furnished on or after the date of the enactment of this act.

A memorandum presented by Mr. SHORTRIDGE accompanying Senate bill 4971 was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM STATEMENT ACCOMPANYING PROPOSED JOINT RESOLUTION BY SENATOR SHORTRIDGE TO AMEND SECTION 616 OF THE REVENUE ACT OF 1932 IN CERTAIN ADMINISTRATIVE PARTICULARS

The changes as suggested in the amendment of section 616 of the revenue act of 1932, relating to the tax on electrical energy, involve practically those of collection only, with no increase or decrease of revenue.

The change suggested in (1) by striking out in subdivision (a) the words "and to be collected by the vendor" is for the particular purposes of relieving the vendors from the collection of the tax. This amendment is designed primarily to relieve States and municipal and political subdivisions of States from the obligation imposed on them by subdivision (a) of collecting the Federal revenue, which obligation would entail a heavy expenditure of public funds for additional machinery and for additional personnel to meet what should be solely a Federal expense, namely, the cost of collecting the Federal tax. From this point of view the burden at present laid on the States and political subdivisions is not only economically onerous but is politically unsound and we believe to be subject to serious constitutional objections.

The change suggested by (2) in striking out all of subdivision (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the amendment is for the purpose of eliminating such provisions as are not pertinent after making the change in subdivision (a). The matter set out in (b) is purely administrative, to allow the commissioner to specify the method for gathering the revenue without imposing an obligation on States or political subdivisions.

The additive change (3) is for the particular purpose of defining a political subdivision so as to remove any doubts as to the scope of the words "political subdivision."

AMENDMENT TO HOME LOAN BANK BILL

Mr. COUZENS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

COAL MINING IN ALASKA—MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider the vote upon the bill (H. R. 12281) to encourage the mining of coal adjacent to the Alaska Railroad, in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). That motion will be entered.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, what is the bill, may I ask?

Mr. HOWELL. This is a bill that was passed by the House and the Senate authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make such disposition as to keep two or more coal mines open in Alaska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Where is the bill now?

Mr. HOWELL. The bill has gone to the House; and I now move that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a privileged motion and is in order.

Mr. WATSON. That is all right. I want that understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States, submitting nominations, was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

HOUSE BILL PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

The bill (H. R. 7894) to promote safety on the streets and highways of the District of Columbia by providing for the financial responsibility of owners and operators of motor vehicles for damages caused by motor vehicles on the public highways in the District of Columbia, to prescribe penalties for the violation of the provisions of this act, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and ordered to be placed on the calendar.

STATEMENT OF HON. DANIEL C. ROPER ON THE LIQUOR PLANK OF THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD a statement by Hon. Daniel C. Roper, of Washington, D. C., on the liquor plank of the Democratic platform.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We are in economic chaos, millions of people unemployed, discouraged, and hungry. We can not hope to deal constructively with social questions until this economic condition is relieved. We must first feed the people. The platform of the Democratic Party is clear and constructive on economic problems, and my long personal acquaintance with Roosevelt and GARNER convinces me that they have the wisdom, vision, and human interest to lead us out of our despair into that independence of thought and action which will restore the responsibility of citizenship needed to safeguard social conditions. I am, therefore, wholeheartedly for the Democratic ticket.

To many sincere drys the question raised in the Democratic plank by the words "we favor repeal of the eighteenth amendment" is one of conscience. The action taken reflected the views of the majority, but certainly no such action could deny full liberty of thought and conscience to the minority.

It is evident to me that the temperance cause can be best served in this campaign by minimizing the agitation of the prohibition question and by the drys devoting their energies to the election of United States Senators and Congressmen in accord with their views. The prohibition problem must be treated through the Congress in final analysis. It is the will of the people that must prevail, and this will must ultimately function through the Congress.

The cause of temperance has been injured in the past through political antagonisms. Great institutions like the churches and their various affiliates have been weakened because of the fact that they have in recent years been endeavoring to support a social cause through political machinery. What the temperance cause now needs is a return to those methods of education employed in bringing about national prohibition. This can be done by lining up organizations interested in the cause behind the principles of temperance without relating their activities to politics.

LAND ADJACENT TO BOLLING FIELD IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. REED. I submit a conference report on House bill 11732, relative to the matter of completing acquisition of land adjacent to Bolling Field in the District of Columbia.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11732) to amend section 2 of an act approved February 25, 1929 (45 Stat. 1303), to complete the acquisition of land adjacent to Bolling Field, D. C., and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 3, and agree to the same.

DAVID A. REED,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

LISTER HILL,
W. FRANK JAMES,
JAMES M. FITZPATRICK,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. REED. The House accepts all of the Senate amendments by this conference report. I move its adoption.

The report was agreed to.

HOME-LOAN BANKS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12280) to create Federal home-loan banks, to provide for the supervision thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I urge Senators on this side of the aisle to vote to reconsider the Couzens substitute. I do so, however, in the fond hope and expectation that Senators on the other side of the aisle who profess to be in favor of this home loan bill will join us in a reconsideration of the Walcott amendment.

I repeat to-day what I said last night and have said before, that with the Walcott amendment added to the bill it is of no use to the building and loan associations and the other institutions giving long-time amortized mortgages in this country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator that with the Walcott amendment on, the Couzens proposal is preferable, in my judgment, to the bill as it was amended in the Senate. Has the Senator any assurance, however, that the Walcott amendment will be withdrawn if the Couzens amendment is reconsidered and disapproved?

Mr. COPELAND. I wish I had the assurance that that would happen. I have been told privately by some Senators who voted under a misunderstanding of the purpose of the Walcott amendment that they will vote to reconsider it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I wonder if we could not reach a compromise on the Walcott amendment. I think we could arrange with the author of the Walcott amendment that he would consent to, say, a 10-year limitation; and within 10 years we would have plenty of time to see whether we wanted to continue this system or not. Perhaps that would accomplish what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. COPELAND. I would not be interested in that. The bill itself provides for a way to terminate the system at any time. The pending bill contains that provision, section 29. This bill is of interest to the building and loan associations and the other lenders of money on long-term mortgages. Its value lies in the fact that it proposes to set up a reservoir out of which funds can be drawn to carry on and enlarge the work of the associations, and particularly in this crisis to take care of those mortgages which are now threatened with foreclosure. To limit its operation by such a proposal would discourage and destroy its purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I am wondering why the Senator wants to reconsider the Walcott amendment when the motion upon which we must vote is one to reconsider the Couzens amendment?

Mr. COPELAND. The reason why I persist in it is because, so far as I am concerned, as I have said from the beginning, if the Walcott amendment is left in, the Couzens amendment is far preferable to the original bill with the Walcott amendment. I want to make clear that if we do reconsider the Couzens amendment and then fail to reconsider the Walcott amendment, if the Senator from Michigan himself does not do it, I am going to offer an amendment sufficiently like the Couzens amendment to be eligible under the rules. With the limitation of five years on the loans proposed it is of no value to the amortization of mortgages now outstanding.

Further, Mr. President, only yesterday there was held in New York a meeting of certain insurance companies who are seeking to kill this bill, and who will attempt to load it down with other amendments if we do succeed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will my friend permit another observation?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not understand why we should delay a vote on the Couzens amendment for the reasons given by the Senator. If it happens that the Couzens amendment is stricken out, and later on the amendment in which the Senator is so deeply interested should likewise be left in, as it is now, it would be in order for the Senator to make his motion and his argument then.

Mr. COPELAND. I have not made myself clear. I am saying what I am to urge some of my friends who voted for the Couzens amendment to vote now for reconsideration. I voted for the Couzens amendment, and I am going to change my vote; but I am doing it, and urging that others do it, in order that we may make a test of the sincerity of the men over here as to their attitude toward the legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that I voted for the Couzens amendment. I am going to vote against reconsideration. I voted for the other amendment also, but I have listened to the argument of the Senator and others. I think I have a perfectly open mind. When the motion is made to reconsider that other amendment I want to consider it, and if I am convinced that the Senator is right, I am going to vote to reconsider it.

Mr. COPELAND. There is no more fair-minded man in the Senate than the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand why we should delay this vote for that reason.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I do not know how the Senator expects the Senate to vote on two motions to reconsider at the same time. Furthermore, he can not expect the present motion to reconsider to be withdrawn and the other offered first. This one is in order before the Senate and has been for two or three days. There is no reason why we should not vote on it, vote it up or vote it down, and end it.

I have said to the Senator personally and on the floor that I expected to join him in an effort to reconsider the Walcott amendment. That is all I can say to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is very just, and I have no doubt he will carry out that undertaking. He has it in his hands to make this a first-class bill or to make it worth nothing to the people of our country.

Mr. WATSON. If it be in my hands to do it, it will be done; and nobody knows that better than my friend from New York.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I voted for the Walcott amendment. I voted for the Couzens amendment to limit this system to four banks. I think we might well try this out on a gradual process.

I recall Congress passed the Federal land bank bill with very similar provisions to this bill; and I saw, as we all have seen, the operation of that land bank bill—a lot of mortgages unloaded on these banks by those who had these lands that were of little value, and the banks took over literally millions of acres of land that were not worth what was loaned upon them. For my part, I want to go slowly before I plunge this Government into creating another system of banks that will take over a lot of bad mortgages, and that will involve such banks in taking over a lot of property in this country. I do not appreciate the attitude of the Senator that all of us who take the other view are against the home owners of this country.

That is what I fear will happen in this matter, Mr. President. I think the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is directly in point in this situation. It proposes to make available $400,000,000 to be loaned to these associations which are making loans to home owners all over America. For my part, I think we would advance the cause of this bill if we would keep the amendment as it is now on the bill, and let the measure go to conference, and see if the conferees can not work out a bill that will protect these banks against the worthless mortgages that it will be attempted to unload on them, and give the home owner some real benefit, rather than those who have made foolish loans.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I voted against the Couzens substitute for the bill chiefly because I do not believe that as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is set up it is well qualified to perform the service that this proposed legislation contemplates.

Up to date, no advance has been made to a building and loan association by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a period longer than six months. Under the existing law, all loans by the corporation are limited to a period of three years. The fact that the corporation merely makes emergency loans to financial institutions renders it, in my judgment, scarcely well qualified to conduct a scheme such as is planned by the home loan bank bill.

There are a great many reasons, in my judgment, that might be advanced why the plan of the bill is preferable to the plan of the Couzens substitute for the bill. For these and other reasons that I shall not now attempt to assign in detail, I expect to vote to reconsider the substitute.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, there seems to be a misunderstanding with respect to the substitute which the Senate previously adopted. There is no provision in the substitute which prohibits the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from loaning money to any building and loan association or other agency which is a beneficiary under the act on any mortgage, no matter how long it may be. In other words, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act already provides for 3-year loans.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has the substitute as it was agreed to been printed?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; it has been printed, and it has also been read into the RECORD. I have some copies, if the Senator desires one.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should like to have a copy. The copy at the clerk's desk is necessarily marked up.

Is this copy which the Senator has supplied me in the form in which the substitute was agreed to?

Mr. COUZENS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COUZENS. May I also point out to the Senator that the substitute which has already been accepted by the Senate is, of course, open to amendment if it does not suit any Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand it has already been agreed to.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but it is still open to amendment, because it was an amendment to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It would have been subject to amendment before it was adopted, but I should think under the rule it would hardly be subject to amendment now. That, however, is not the point that I had in mind. I note, in addition to what has been stated in connection with the bill, that the loans are limited to 40 per cent of the value of the real estate with respect to which such mortgages are given.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true. There is no change in that provision of the substitute or amendment from the original bill as proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It follows the home loan bank bill proper?

Mr. COUZENS. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And that would be about 28 per cent of the normal value, if the figures presented by the Senator from Indiana are accurate.

Mr. COUZENS. I think that is true. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, in section 4, says:

> The corporation shall have succession for a period of 10 years from the date of the enactment hereof, unless it is sooner dissolved by an act of Congress.

So there is no occasion to worry about the little home owner not having available the funds of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

In section 5 it is provided:

> Each such loan may be made for a period not exceeding three years, and the corporation may from time to time extend the time of payment of any such loan, through renewal, substitution of new obligations, or otherwise, but the time for such payment shall not be extended beyond five years from the date upon which such loan was made originally.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is a material provision and substantially impairs the value of the proposed act in the eyes of those who are sponsoring this legislation. Building and loan associations usually make loans for from 8 to 14 years, according to my recollection. Under this measure no loan could be made for a longer period than three years, subject to a possible extension for two years more. That is one of the points which I think will cause the measure to be regarded as not effective for the purposes of the statute.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may I point out to the Senator that there is no limitation on the length of the loans which the home-loan association may make? They put up security with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, consisting of mortgages of any length. There is no limitation on the length of the mortgage.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Would the Senator expect, if this provision becomes law, that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would make loans to, say, building and loan associations, for a period ranging from 8 to 14 years?

Mr. COUZENS. No; that is not what I said. What I said was that when a building and loan association applies to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a loan there is no inhibition against the Reconstruction Finance Corporation lending money to the building and loan association for a 3-year period, secured by mortgages running for from 8 to 14 years.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly not.

Mr. COUZENS. Then why can not the building and loan association continue to make the loans for any length of time which in their discretion seems wise, and simply secure the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with a deposit of mortgages?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. They can, if they can get the credit; but if they extend credit for from 8 to 14 years, and can get credit for a period of only 3 to 5 years, they certainly could not rely upon this statute, or the resources behind it, to finance their operations.

Mr. COUZENS. They have always done it. Ever since the organization of building and loan associations they have been borrowing money from the financial institutions of the United States for periods of six months or a year, secured or unsecured, and when secured, secured by mortgages running any length of time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But that was in normal times, and not in an emergency period.

Mr. COUZENS. What I am trying to point out is that this is an emergency measure. I am assuming that we will be out of this emergency in three years. If we are out of it in three years, this temporary provision in my amendment would carry them over. Of course, if the Senator contends that we are going to be in this sort of condition indefinitely, the point is well taken.

I want to respond now to a statement made by the Senator from Indiana yesterday.
